(110) Theſe no Peace-makers for Chriſt, but firebrands of Belial, blew the ſmothered ſparkes of diſſention into a flame of bloody warre, which fell the more heauy vpon Scotland, for that King Iames much wedded vnto his owne will, and altogether ruled by men of meane worth, whom himſelfe had aduanced from nothing, had not onely neglected by their inſtigations the loue of his Nobles, but alſo baniſhed the Realme of Scotland, Alexander Duke of Albany his ſecond brother; and had cauſed the veines of Iohn Earle of Marre, his other brother, to be opened, whereby he bled to death; theſe and other diſcontents alienated his Subiects hearts from him, which laid the Land more open vnto the Engliſh Inuaders; and yet to draw them more deadly againſt him, relying vpon his owne valor, and the aſſiſtance of France, he ſent word vnto Edward, that he ſhould not aid his own ſiſter of Burgundy againſt K. Lewis, being the Scots Ally; as alſo with threats of warre commanded him to deliuer to his Ambaſſadors, the Duke of Albanie (then reſiding in the Engliſh Court) and laſtly to make good and repay dammages done vpon the Scottiſh Borders.

James King of Scotland much wedded to his owne will.

Alexander Duke of Albany baniſhed Scotland.

Iohn Earle of Merre bled to death.

K. James threatneth warre againſt England.

(111) King Edward not a little inraged at theſe double dealings, euen in the winter ſeaſon muſtered his men, prepared his artillery, and rigged his ſhips, that nothing ſhould bee vnready at the next Spring; which no ſooner was come, but that he ordained for his Lieutenant his brother Richard Duke of Glouceſter, who with Henrie Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Lord Stanley, the Lord Louell, Greiſtock, and others, (the Duke of Albany marching vnder Glouceſters Banner) with twenty thouſand ſtrong repaired into the North: and firſt beſieged the ſtrong Towne Berwicke, then entring the chiefe City Edenburgh, vrged King Iames to performe his couenants concerning the marriage betwixt Prince Iames his Sonne, with Ladie Cicelie, before agreed vpon, threatning deſtruction if the match went not forward.

Richard Duke of Glouceſter made the Kings Lieutenant againſt Scotland.

ward. The Scottiſh Nobilitie conſidering the eminent danger, put to death the wicked Counſellers of their King, ordained the Duke of Albany the Vicegerent of Scotland, and promiſed to re-pay the money receiued according to Couenants; after which, with the deliuery of the ſtrong Towne Berwicke, which had beene out of the Engliſh poſſeſſion the ſpace of one and twentie yeeres, a generall peace was concluded betwixt the two Realmes. Whereupon not long after, Garter King at Armes was ſent into Scotland, with an Inſtrument in writing vnto the Prouoſt and Burgeſſes of Edenburgh, (who had vndertaken to diſburſe the money) to ſignifie King Edwards minde touching the marriage intended, and to demand the ſaid ſumme by a day aſſigned, which accordingly was repaide.

Holinſh. p. 707.

(112) The marriage with Scotland thus broken off; that with Scotland for the Lady Cicely, by King Edward himſelfe; that with France for the Princeſſe Elizabeth, both he and his Queene greatly deſired, and daily ſought after: But Lewis the French King, finding the daughter of Auſtrich more fit for his Sonne, dallied out Edward with ſhewes of firme faith, till hee had effected the thing hee went about: which muſicke ſounded ſo harſhly in the Engliſh Kings eare, when he heard it, as in no wiſe hee would ſuffer that ſtring to be touched, but euer beleeued that the French meant him faire play, and although the yeeres of the parties themſelues might beget ſome ſuſpition, ſhee being much elder then the Daulphin, and the truth thereof confirmed by the Duke of Auſtriches Leger-Ambaſſadours reſiding in England, yet Edward would not ſo much as ſuppoſe a ſuſpect againſt the French King, and therefore ſuffered Lewis to incroach vpon thoſe parts of Picardie that joyned to Callis, and to gaine time till it was paſt re-call: for then the Lord Howard returning from France, confidently told him that he was preſent, and ſaw the Lady Margaret of Auſtrich, daughter to Duke Maximilian, Sonne to the Emperour Fredericke, receiued vnto France with great pompe and royaltie: and at Ambois contracted and eſpouſed to the Daulphin.

King Lewis dalleth with King Edward.

Phil. Comines, lib. 6. cap. 2. and 9.

King Edward would not beleeue what was confidently told him.

(113) Edward mightily chafed to be thus worked by Lewis, made great preparation for France, but whether with anger, griefe, or melancholy, he fell into a dangerous and deadly ſickneſſe; ſome ſay, of a ſuperfluous ſurfeit, whereunto he was much giuen: Comines ſaith, of a Catarrhe; which weake eſtate turned his minde another way: for calling his Lords into his ſicke preſence, and raiſing his faint body vpon his Bed-Pillowes, theſe words vnto them he laſtly ſpake:

A warre pretended againſt France.

Thom. Moore. King Edwards ſpeeches at his death.

"(114) My Lords, my deare Kinſmen, "and Allies; in what plight I lye, you "ſee, and I feele; by which the leſſe while "I looke to liue with you, the more "deepely am I mooued to care in what "caſe I leaue you; for ſuch as I leaue "you, ſuch be my children like to finde "you. Which if they ſhould (that "God forbid) finde you at variance, "might hap to fall themſelues at warre, "ere their diſcretion would ſerue to ſet "you at peace. Yee ſee their youth, of "which I reckon the only ſuretie to reſt "in your concord. For it ſufficeth not "that all you loue them, if each of you "hate other. If they were men, your "faithfulneſſe happely would ſuffice: but "Childe-hood muſt be maintained by "mens authoritie, and ſlippery youth "vnder-propped with elder Counſell; "which neither they can haue, vnleſſe "you giue it, nor you giue it, if you "agree not. For where each laboureth "to break that which the other maketh, "& through hatred of each others per-"ſon impugneth each others counſell, "there muſt it needs bee long or any "good concluſion goe forward: And "while either party ſtriueth to be chief, "flattery ſhall haue more play then plain "and faithfull aduiſe, of which muſt "needes inſue the euill bringing vp of "the Prince; whoſe minde in tender "youth infected, ſhall readily fall to riot "and miſchiefe; and draw downe with "him his noble Realme vnto ruine: but "if grace turne him to wiſdome: which "if God ſend, then they that by euill "meanes before pleaſed him beſt, ſhall "after fall furtheſt out of fauour, ſo that "euer at length euill drifts draw to "nought, and good plaine waies proſ-"per. Great variance hath there long "time beene betweene you, not alwaies "for great cauſes. "But this wot I well, yee neuer had ſo "great cauſe of hatred, as you haue of "loue.

The perils of diſcord.

Tender youth is ſoone infected.

Great variance for ſmall cauſes.

"loue. That we be all men, that we be "Christian men, this shall I leaue for "Preachers to tell you (and yet I wot "nere whether any Preachers words "ought more to moue you, then his, that "is by and by going to the place that "they all preach of.) But this I shall de- "sire you to remember, that the one "part of you is of my blood, the other "of my Allies; and each of you with "other, either of kinred or affinitie; "which spirituall kindred of affinitie, if "the Sacraments of Christs Church "beare that weight with vs, that would "to God they did, should no lesse moue "vs to charitie, then the respect of "fleshly consanguinitie. Our Lord for- "bid, that you loue together the worse "for the selfe cause, that you ought to "loue the better. And yet that happe- "neth, and no where finde we so deadly "debate, as among them, which by na- "ture & law ought most to agree toge- "ther. Such a pestilent Serpent is ambi- "tion, and desire of vaine-glory and So- "ueraignty, which among States where "it once entreth, creepeth forth so far, "till with diuision and variance he tur- "neth all to mischiefe, first longing to "be next the best, afterward equall with "the best, and at last chiefe and aboue "the best. Of which immoderate appe- "tite of worship, and thereby of debate "and dissention, what losse, what sor- "row, what trouble, hath within these "few yeeres growne in this Realme, I "pray God as well forget as we re- "member. Which things, if I could "aswell haue fore-seene, as I haue with "my more paine then pleasure proued, "By Gods blessed Lady (that was euer "his oath) I would neuer haue won the "courtesie of mens knees, with the losse "of so many heads. But sith things "passed cannot be gaine-called, much "ought we the more beware, by what "occasion we haue taken so great hurt "afore, that we eft-soones fall not into "the like againe. Now be those griefes "passed, and all is (God be thanked) "quiet, and likely right-well to prosper "in wealthfull peace vnder your Cou- "sins, my children, if God send them "life, and you loue. Of which two "things the lesse losse were they, by "whom though God did his pleasure, "yet should the Realme alway finde "Kings, & peraduenture as good Kings. "But if you among your selues in a "childes raigne fall at debate, many a "good man shall perish, and happely he "too, and yee too, ere this Land finde "peace againe. Wherefore, in these last "words that euer I looke to speake with "you, I exhort, and require you all, for "the loue that you haue euer borne vn- "to mee, for the loue that I haue euer "borne vnto you, for the loue that our "Lord beareth to vs all, from this time "forward all griefes forgotten, each of "you loue others, which I verily trust "you will, if you any thing regard, ei- "ther GOD, or your King, affinitie, or "kindred, this Realme, your owne "Countrey, or your owne sureties.

What the nature of ambition is.

King Edwards vsuall oath.

King Edwards last request.

(115) And therewithall the King no longer induring to sit vp, laid him down on his right side, his face towards them, who with weeping eyes and words as fitted the time, recomfited the sicke dying King, joyning their hands, and outwardly forgiuing that, which inwardly they meant not to forget. The King ouer-joyed to see their willing reconcilements, spake not many words after, but commending his soule vnto God, in their presence departed this life at his Palace of Westminster, vpon the ninth day of Aprill, and yeere of Christs appearance 1483. at the age of fortie one, when hee had worne the Royall Diadem, two and twentie yeeres, one moneth, and fiue dayes: and was buried at Windsore, in the new Chappell, whose foundation himselfe had laid.

The raigne and death of King Edward.

(116) Of personage he was the goodliest Gentleman (saith Comines) that euer mine eyes beheld; faire of complexion, and of most princely presence, couragious of heart, politique in counsell; in aduersitie nothing abashed; in prosperitie rather joyous then proud: in peace just and mercifull; in warre sharpe and fierce, and in field bold and venturous, yet no further then wisedome would, and is no lesse commended where hee auoided, then is his manhood when he vanquished: eight or nine battels he won, wherein to his greater renowne he fought on foote, and was euer Victor ouer his enemies: much giuen he was to the lusts of youth, and in his latter time growne somewhat corpulent, which rather adorned his grauer yeeres, then any waies disliked the eyes of his beholders.

His Wife.

(117) Elizabeth, the daughter of Richard Wooduill Earle Riuers, by his Wife Iaquelana

Iaquelana Dutcheſſe of Bedford, (who was the daughter of Peter Earle of Saint Paul, and hee the ſonne of Peter de Luxemburgh) was firſt married vnto Sir Iohn Grey, ſlaine at Saint Albans, where hee was Knighted the day before his death by King Henry the ſixt, vnto whom ſhe bare two ſonnes and a daughter, after whoſe death ſhe was priuately re-married vnto King Edward the fourth, the firſt day of May, at his Manor of Grafton in Northamptonſhire, An. 1464. and in the next yeere following vpon the ſixe and twentieth of May, was crowned Queene at Weſtminſter with all due ſolemnities. Shee was his Wife eighteene yeeres, eleuen moneths, and nine dayes, no more fortunate in attaining to the height of all worldly dignitie, then vnfortunate in the murther of her ſonnes, and loſſe of her owne libertie: For in the beginning of King Edwards raigne, ſhee was forced to take Sanctuary at Weſtminſter, wherein her firſt ſonne Prince Edward was borne; and at his death did the like in feare of the Protector; and laſtly, hauing all her lands and poſſeſſion ſeized vpon by King Henry the ſeuenth, liued in meane eſtate in the Monaſtery of Bermondſey in Southwarke, where not long after ſhee left the troubles of her life, and injoyed a quiet portion or burying-place by her laſt Husband King Edward, at Windſore.

(118) Elianor Butler, as we finde it recorded vpon the Parliament Role, was contracted vnto King Edward: but how true, conſidering the occaſion, and time of the Act, we leaue for others to judge, onely this is moſt certaine, that this Lady Elianor was the daughter of Iohn Talbot Earle of Shrewsbury, and the wife of Sir Thomas Butler Knight, ſonne and heire to Ralph Butler Baron of Sudley, which Elianor died the thirtieth of Iune, the yeer of Chriſt Ieſus 1466. and the eighth of King Edward the fourth his raigne.

His Iſſue.

(119) Edward the eldeſt ſonne of King Edward the fourth by Queene Elizabeth his Wife, was borne in the Sanctuary at Weſtminſter the fourth of Nouember, and yeere of Grace 1471. being the tenth of his Fathers raigne, at that time expulſed the Realme by the powerfull Earle Warwicke; but fortune changed, and the Father reſtored; the Sonne, the firſt of Iuly and yeere of Chriſt, 1473. was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Cheſter; and had not the ambitious hand of his Vncle bin defiled in his innocent blood, he might haue worne the Diadem many yeeres, whereas he bare the Title of King not many dayes.

(120) Richard the ſecond ſonne of K. Edward the fourth by Elizabeth his Queene, was borne at Shrewsbury, and in his infancy was created Duke of Yorke, he was affianced vnto Anne daughter and heire to Iohn Mowbray Duke of Norfolke, by which hee was intituled Duke of Norfolke, Earle-Marſhall, Warren, and Nottingham, but enjoying neither Title, Wife, or his owne life long, was with his Brother murthered in the Tower of London, and in the priſon of that Tower, which vpon that moſt ſinfull deed, is euer ſince called the bloody Tower, their bodies as yet vnknowne where to haue buriall. An. Dom. 1478. Stowe.

(121) George the third ſonne of K. Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his Wife, was alſo borne in Shrewsbury, and being a young Child, was created Duke of Bedford, but liued not long after, and lyeth buried at Windſore.

(122) Elizabeth the firſt daughter of K. Edward the fourth, by Elizabeth his Queene, was borne at Weſtminſter the eleuenth of February, and fift of her Fathers raigne, being the yeere of Saluation 1466. Shee was promiſed in marriage to Charles Daulphin of France, wooed & courted by her Vncle Crouchbacke, when he had murthered her brothers, and vſurped the Crowne, but better deſtiny attending her, ſhee was reſerued to joyne the vnion and marriage with the onely heire of Lancaſter, which was Henry of Richmond, afterward King of England, from whom is branched the Royall ſtemme that ſpreadeth his beautie in this North-weſt world, euen Iames our dread Soueraigne, and great-Britaines Monarch.

(123) Cicelie, the ſecond daughter of King Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was ſought vnto by Iames the third of that name, to be joyned in marriage with Iames his ſonne Prince of Scotland, and Duke of Rothſay, which match was promiſed vpon conditions and choice of King Edward, who laſtly brake off from further proceeding, and the Lady married vnto Iohn Viſcount Wells, whom ſhe out-liued, and was againe re-married, but by neither Husband had any iſſue, and therefore leſſe noted; her body lyeth buried at Quarrena in the Iſle of Wight.

(124) Anne the third daughter of King Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his Wife, was married vnto Lord Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolke, Earle Marſhall, and high Treaſurer of England: vnto whom ſhee bare two ſonnes, both dying without iſſue, and her ſelfe without more fruit of wombe, left her life, and lyeth buried at Framingham in Norfolke.

(125) Bridget the fourth daughter of King Edward the fourth, by his Wife Queene Elizabeth, was borne at Eltham in Kent, the tenth of Nouember, and yeere of Grace, 1480. being the twentieth of her Fathers Raigne. Shee tooke the habite of Religion, and became a Nunne in the Nunnery of Dartford, in the ſame Countie, founded by King Edward the third, where ſhee ſpent her life in contemplations vnto the day of her death.

(126) Marie the fift daughter of King Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his Wife, was promiſed in marriage vnto the King of Denmarke, but died (before it could be ſolemnized) in the Tower of Greenewich, the Sunday before Pentecoſt, the twentieth two of her Fathers Raigne, and yeere of Grace, 1482. and was buried at Windſor.

(127) Margaret the ſixt daughter of King Edward the fourth, by his Wife Queene Elizabeth, died an Infant without other mention in our Authors.

(128) Katherine the ſeuenth daughter of King Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his Wife, and the laſt of them both, was married vnto William Courtney Earle of Deuonſhire, and Lord of Ochampton, vnto whom ſhee bare Lord Henry after the death of his father Earle of Deuonſhire, who by King Henry the eight was created Marqueſſe of Exceſter in Ann. 1525.

His Concubines.

(129) Elizabeth Lucie is certainely knowne to haue beene King Edwards Concubine, though nothing ſo certainly mentioned, whoſe Lady, or of what Parentage ſhee was; that ſhee was conceiued by him with childe is before declared, but who that childe was, is as obſcurely laid down; therefore in theſe things we muſt be ſilent, and leaue the doubts to be reſolued by others. Three other Concubines this King had, whereof Shores Wife was not the leaſt beloued, whoſe life falleth further to be ſpoken of in the Raigne of the vſurper Richard, where her Storie ſhall be ſhewed more at large.

His naturall Iſſue.

(130) Arthur, ſurnamed Plantagenet, the naturall ſonne of King Edward the fourth, (whoſe mother as is ſuppoſed, was the Lady Elizabeth Lucie) was created Viſcount Liſle by King Henry the eight at Bridewell in London, the twentie ſixt of Aprill, and yeere of Saluation, 1533. which title was conferred vpon him in right of his Wife Lady Elizabeth, Siſter and heire vnto Iohn Grey Viſcount Liſle, and the late Wife and then widdow of Edmund Dudley: who bare vnto this Viſcount three daughters, which were Bridget, Frances, and Elizabeth, all of them afterward married. This Arthur Lord Liſle was made Lieutenant of Callis by the ſaid King Henry, which Towne ſome of his ſeruants intended to haue betrayed to the French, for which their fact, himſelfe was ſent to the Tower of London: but his truth appearing after much ſearch, the King ſent him a rich Ring from his owne finger, with ſuch comfortable words, as at the hearing thereof a ſudden joy ouer-charged his heart, and was ſo immoderately receiued, that the ſame night it made an end of his life, whoſe body was honourably buried in the ſame Tower.

(131) Elizabeth the naturall daughter of King Edward the fourth, was married to Sir Thomas Lumley Knight, the Sonne of George Lord Lumley, who dyed before his Father: ſhee bare vnto the ſaid Sir Thomas, Richard, afterward Lord Lumley, from whom the late Lord Lumley did deſcend.

Edward V.

EDVVARD THE FIFTH, KING OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE, AND LORD OF IRELAND, THE FIFTIE FIFTH MONARCH OF THIS LAND; HIS RAIGNE, AND DEATH.

Monarch 55

For the moſt part written by Sir Thomas Moore.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THe Father thus dying in the ſtrength of his yeeres, and the Sonne left to rule before he was ripe, the Cinders of diſſenſions which the ſicke King had lately raked vp, preſently brake forth into a more raging flame; for the King and Queenes blood, that ſhould haue ſupported young Edwards eſtate, the one ſide being ſuſpicious, and the other prouoked by the execrable deſire of Soueraigntie, left the tender King (a Prince of ſuch towardneſſe as his age could containe) deſtitute and vn-armed, which, if either kinde or kindred had holden place, muſt needs haue beene the ſureſt pillars of his defence. The raigne of this King (if we may ſo call the ſhort time of his Soueraignte) began the ſame day that his Father dyed, though he was neuer crowned, nor yet commanded the affaires of the Kingdome as an abſolute Monarch, his yong brothers fortunes being ballanced with his.

King Edwards raigne vnfortunate and short.

Aprill 19. An. Dom. 1483.

Richard Duke of Gloceſter an vnnaturall Vncle vnto the young King and his brother.

(2) For Richard Duke of Glouceſter, by nature their Vncle, by office their Protector, to their Father beholden, to themſelues by Oath and Alleagiance bounden, all bands broken that hold man and man together, without any reſpect of God or the World, vnnaturally contriued to bereaue them, not onely of their dignitie, but alſo their liues. But forſomuch as the Dukes demeanour miniſtreth in effect all the whole matter whereof the raigne of this young and fift Edward muſt intreat, it is therefore conuenient, ſomewhat to ſhew you ere wegoe further, what man this was, and from whom hee deſcended that could find in his heart ſo much miſchiefe to conceiue.

Richard Duke of Yorke was the father of Richard Duke of Gloceſter.

(3) Know firſt then, that Richard Duke of Yorke, a Noble-man and a mightie, began not by warre, but by law to challenge the Crowne; putting his claime into the Parliament; where his cauſe was (either for right or fauour) ſo farre forth aduanced, that King Henries blood (albeit hee had a goodly Prince) was vtterly rejected, the Crowne by the authoritie of that high Court intailed to the Duke of Yorke, and his iſſue male in remainder, immediately after the death of King Henry. But the Duke not induring ſo long to tarry, intending vnder pretext of diſſenſion and debate ariſing in the Realme, to preuent his time, and to take vpon him the rule in King Henries life, was with many other Nobles ſlaine at Wakefield, leauing three ſonnes, Edward, George, and Richard; all of them as they were great ſtates of birth, ſo were they great and ſtately of ſtomacke, greedy and ambitious of authoritie, and impatient of partners.

(4) For Edward reuenging his fathers death, depriued King Henry, and attained the Crowne; The ſecond, George Duke of Clarence, was a goodly Noble Prince, and in all things fortunate, if either his owne ambition had not ſet him againſt his brother, or the enuy of his enemies, his brother againſt him. For were it by the Queene and Lords of her blood, which highly maligned the Kings kindred (as women commonly, not of malice, but of nature hate them whom their husbands loue) or were it a proud appetite of the Duke himſelfe, intending to be King: at leaſt-wiſe hainous Treaſon was laid to his charge, and finally were he faulty, were hee faultleſſe, attainted hee was by Parliament, and judged to death, as wee haue ſaid.

The deſcription of Richard Duke of Gloceſter.

(5) Richard the third ſonne, of whom we now entreat, was in wit and courage equall with either of them, in body and proweſſe farre vnder them both, little of ſtature, ill-limmed, and crook-backed, his left ſhoulder much higher then his right, very hard-fauoured of viſage, and ſuch as in States is called warrely, in other men otherwiſe: he was malicious, wrathfull, and enuious, yea, and from afore his birth euer froward. For it is for truth reported, that the Dutcheſſe his Mother had ſo much adoe in her trauell, that ſhe could not be deliuered of him vncut, and that he came into the world with his feet forward, as men be borne outward, and (as the fame runneth) alſo not vntoothed; Whether men of hatred report aboue the truth, or elſe that nature changed her courſe in his beginning, which in the courſe of his life many things vnnaturally committed.

Richard Crookbacke, a good ſouldier.

(6) No euill Captaine was he in the warre, as to which his diſpoſition was more inclined then for peace; ſundry victories he had, and ſometimes ouerthrowes, but neuer in default as for his owne perſon, either of hardineſſe, or politicke order; free was hee of his diſpence, and ſomewhat aboue his power liberall: with large gifts he gate him vnſtedfaſt friendſhip, for which he was forced to pill & pole in other places, which gate him ſtedfaſt hatred. Hee was cloſe and ſecret, a deepe diſſembler, lowly of countenance, arrogant of heart, outwardly familiar where euen now hee hated, and not letting to kiſſe whom he thought to kill: deſpitefull and cruell he was, not for euill-will alwayes, but oftner for ambition, and either for the ſuretie or increaſe of his eſtate. Friend and foe was much-what indifferent; where his aduantage grew, hee ſpared no mans death, whoſe life withſtood his purpoſe. He ſlew with his owne hands,

A Iudas kiſſe.

King

King Henry the ſixth, being Priſoner in the Tower, as men conſtantly ſaid, and that without commandement or knowledge of the King, who vndoubtedly if he had intended his death, would haue appointed that butcherly office to ſome other then his owne brother.

He was the cauſe of Clarence his death.

(7) Some wiſe men alſo judge, that his drift couertly conueyed, lacked not in helping forth his brother Clarence to his death; which hee reſiſted openly, howbeit ſomewhat (as men deemed) more faintly, then he that was heartily minded to his wealth: And they that thus judge, thinke that long time in King Edwards life, he fore-caſt to be King, in caſe that his brother (whoſe life he looked that euill diet ſhould ſhorten) ſhould happen to deceaſe (as indeed hee did) while his children were young. And they deeme that for this intent he was glad of the Duke of Clarence death, whoſe life muſt needes haue hindered him ſo intending, (being his elder brother) whether the ſame Duke had kept him true to his Nephew the young King, or enterprized to be King himſelf. But of all this point there is no certaintie, and who ſo diuineth vpon conjectures, may aſwell ſhoote too farre as too ſhort. Howbeit this haue I by credible information learned, that the ſame night in which King Edward dyed, one Miſtlebroke (long ere morning) came in great haſte to the houſe of one Pottier dwelling in Red-Croſſe ſtreete without Creeple-gate in London: and when hee with haſty rapping, quickly was let in, he ſhewed vnto Pottier that King Edward was departed. By my troth, man, quoth Pottier, then will my maſter the Duke of Gloceſter be King: What cauſe hee had ſo to thinke, hard it is to ſay, whether being toward him, knew any ſuch thing intended, or otherwiſe had any inkling thereof, for it was not likely that he ſpake it of no ground.

The ſpeech of Pottier at King Edwards death.

(8) But now to returne to the courſe of this Hiſtory; were it that the Duke of Gloceſter had of old fore-minded this concluſion, and was now thereunto moued, and put in hope by the occaſion of the tender age of the young Princes his Nephewes (as opportunitie and likelyhood of ſpeed putteth a man in courage of that he neuer intended) certaine it is, that hee contriued their deſtruction, with the vſurpation of the Regall dignitie vpon himſelfe, and foraſmuch as hee well wiſt, and holpe to maintaine a long continued grudge and heart-burning betweene the Queenes kindred, and the Kings blood, either part enuying others authoritie; hee now thought their diuiſions ſhould be (as it was indeed) a forward beginning to the purſuite of his intent, and a ſure ground for the foundation of all his building, if he might firſt, vnder the pretext of reuenging old diſpleaſure, abuſe the anger and ignorance of the one party, to the deſtruction of the other, and then winne to his purpoſe as many as he could, and thoſe that could not be wonne, might be loſt before they were aware; for of one thing was he certaine, that if his intent were perceiued, hee ſhould ſoone haue made peace betweene both the parties with his owne blood.

Richards deepe policy.

(9) King Edward in his life, albeit that this diſſenſion betweene his friends ſomewhat grieued him, yet in his good health he ſomewhat leſſe regarded it, becauſe hee thought whatſoeuer buſineſſe ſhould fall betweene them, himſelf ſhould alwaies be able to rule both the parties. But in his laſt ſickneſſe, when hee perceiued his naturall ſtrength ſo ſore infeebled, that he deſpaired all recouery; then conſidering the youth of his Children, albeit he nothing leſſe miſtruſted then that that happened, yet well fore-ſeeing how many harmes might grow by their debate, while the youth of his Children ſhould lacke diſcretion of themſelues, and good Counſell of their friends, of which either party ſhould counſell for their own commoditie, and the rather by pleaſant aduice to winne themſelues fauour, then by profitable aduertiſements to doe his Children good, he called ſome of them before him that were at variance, and in ſpeciall the Lord Marqueſſe Dorſet, the Queenes Sonne by her firſt Husband, and William Lord Haſtings a Nobleman, then Lord Chamberlain, againſt whom the Queene eſpecially grudged, for the great fauour the King bare him: and alſo for that ſhee thought him ſecretly familiar with the King in wanton company. Her kindred alſo bare him ſore, aſwell for that the King had made him Captaine of Callis, which office the Lord Riuers, brother to the Queene, claimed of the King for promiſe, as for diuers other great gifts which he receiued, that they looked for. Theſe were the grudges which the King on his death-bed ſought to remooue, and they in ſhew seemed to cancell, as wee haue said, though the sparkes of these displeasures burst afterward into a dangerous flame, which consumed most of them, as afterward shall appeare.

King Edward repaireth towards London.

(10) For assoone as the King was departed this life, his Sonne Prince Edward drew towards London from Ludlow in Wales, which Countrey being farre off from the law, and recourse to justice, was become to be farre out of Order, and growne wilde; Robbers, Rouers, walking at libertie vncorrected: for which cause this Prince in the life time of his Father was sent thither, to the end that the authoritie of his presence should refraine euill-disposed persons, from the boldnesse of their former outrages. To the gouernance and ordering of this young Prince at his sending thither, was there appointed Sir Anthony Wooduill Lord Riuers, brother vnto the Queene, a right honourable man, as valiant of hand as politicke in Counsell; adjoyned were there vnto him others of the same party, and in effect euery one as he was neerest of kin vnto the Queene, so was he planted next about the Prince.

The Queenes kindred onely about the Prince.

(11) That drift of the Queene, not vnwisely deuised, whereby her blood might of youth be rooted in the Princes fauour, the Duke of Glouceſter turned vnto their destruction, and vpon that ground set the foundation of all his vnhappy fabrick. For whomsoeuer he perceiued either at variance with them, or bearing himselfe, their fauour, he brake vnto them; some by mouth, some by writing & secret messengers, that it was neither reason, nor in any wise to be suffred, that the young King their Master and kinseman, should be in the hands & Custody of his mothers kindred, sequestered in manner from their Company and attendance, of which euery one ought him as faithfull seruice as they, & many of them farre more honourable part of kin then his mothers side: whose blood (quoth he) sauing the Kings pleasure, was far vnmeet to be matched with his, which now to be as who say remooued from the King, and the lesse noble to be left about him, is (quoth he) neither honourable to his Majesty nor vnto vs, and also to his Grace no surety, to haue the mightiest of his friends from him, and vnto vs no little ieopardy, to suffer our well-prooued euill-willers to grow in ouer-great authoritie with the Prince in youth, who is light of beliefe and soone perswaded. Yee remember, I trow, King Edward himselfe, albeit he was a man of age and discretion, yet was he in many things ruled by the bend, more then stood either with his honour, or our profit, or with the commodity of any man else, except onely the immoderate aduancement of themselues. Which whether they sorer thirsted after their owne weale, or our woe, it were hard I weene to gesse, and if some folks friendship had not held better place with the King, then any respect of kindred, they might perhaps easily haue intrapped and brought some of vs to confusion ere this; why not as easily as they haue done some other already, as neere of his royall blood as we? But our Lord hath wrought his wil, and thanks be to his Grace, that perill is past: howbeit as great is growing, if we suffer this yong king in our enemies hand; which without his knowledge might abuse the name of his commandement, to any of our vndoing, which thing God and good prouision forbid.

The crafty complaints of Richard Duke of Glouceſter.

(12) Of which good prouision none of vs hath any thing the lesse neede, for the late made atonement, in which the Kings pleasure had more place then the parties wils: nor none of vs, I beleeue, is so vnwise ouersoon to trust a new friend made of an old foe, or to thinke that an hourely kindnesse, suddenly contracted in one houre, continued yet scarce a fortnight, should be deeper settled in their stomackes, then a long accustomed malice many yeeres rooted. With these words and writings and such other, the Duke of Glouceſter soone set a fire them that were of themselues apt enough to kindle, especially two, Edward Duke of Buckingham, and William Lord Hastings Chamberlaine, both men of honour, and of great power. The one by long succession from his Ancestry: the other by his office, and the Kings fauour. These two not bearing each to other so much loue, as both of them hatred vnto the Queenes part, in this point accorded together, with the Duke of Glouceſter, that they would vtterly remooue from the Kings Company all his mothers friends vnder the name of their enemies.

The effect that his policy tooke.

The Duke seeketh to displace the Prince.

The conclusion of his designes.

(13) Vpon this conclusion the Duke of Glouceſter vnderstanding that the Lords, which at that time were about the King, intended to bring him to London to his Coronation, accompanied with such power of their friends, that it should be hard for him to bring his purpose to passe, passe, without the gathering a great assembly of people, and in manner of open warre, whereof the end he wist well was doubtfull, and in which the King being on their side, his part should haue the face and name of a Rebellion; he secretly therefore, by diuers meanes, caused the Queene to bee perswaded and brought in minde; that it neither were need, and also should be icopardous, the King to come vp strong.

Another craftie policy of Duke Richard.

(14) For whereas now euery Lord loued other, and no other thing studied vpon, but about the Coronation and honour of the King: if the Lords of her kindred should assemble in the Kings name much people, they should giue the Lords of the contrary faction cause to feare and suspect, lest they should gather this people, not for the Kings safe-gard, whom no man impugned, but for their destruction, hauing more regard to their old variance, then their new atonement: for which cause they should assemble on the other party much people againe for their defence, whose power she wist well stretched far: and thus should all the Realme fall on an vproare: and of all the hurt that thereof should ensue, which was likely not to be a little, and the most harme like to fall where she least would, all the world would put her and her kindred in the blame, and say that they had vnwisely and vntruly also broken the amitie and peace which the King her husband so prudently made betwixt his kin and hers on his death-bed, and which the other partie faithfully obserued.

The Queene yeeldeth to the Dukes perswasion.

(15) The Queene in this wise perswaded, sent such word vnto her Son; and vnto her brother, being about the King: besides, the Duke of Glouceſter himselfe, and other Lords, the chiefe of his bend, wrote vnto the King so reuerently, and to the Queenes friends there so louingly, that they nothing earthly mistrusting, brought vp the King in great haste, but not in good speed, with a sober company. Now was the King in his way to London, gone from Northampton, when the Dukes of Glouceſter and Buckingham came thither, where remained behinde, the Lord Riuers the Kings Vncle, intending on the morrow to follow the King, and be with him at Stony-Stratford, twelue miles thence, earely ere hee departed. So was there made that night much friendly cheere betwixt these two Dukes and the Lord Riuers a great while: but incontinent after that, they were openly with great courtesie departed, and the Lord Riuers lodged; the Dukes secretly with a few of their most priuy friends, set them downe in Councell, wherein they spent a great part of the night, and at their rising, in the dawning of the day, they sent out priuily to their seruants in their Innes and lodgings about, giuing command to make themselues shortly ready, for their Lords were to horse-ward: vpon which messages, many of their folke were attendant, when many of the Lord Riuers seruants were vnready.

The Lords meet at Northampton.

(16) Now had these Dukes taken into their custodies the keyes of the Inne, that none should passe forth without their license: and besides this, in the high way towards Stony-Stratford, where the King lay, they had bestowed certaine of their men, that should send back againe, & compell to returne any man that were gotten out of Northampton towards Stony-Stratford, till they had further order: forasmuch as the Dukes themselues intended, for the shew of their diligence, to be the first that should that day attend vpon the Kings Highnesse out of that Towne. Thus bare they folke in hand: but when the Lord Riuers vnderstood the gates closed, the wayes beset, neither his seruants, or himselfe suffered to goe out, considering well, so great a thing without his knowledge, could not bee done for nought; and comparing this present manner with his last nights cheere, in so few houres to haue so great a change, maruailously misliked it. Howbeit, sith hee could not get away, nor keepe himselfe close, hee would not, lest he should seeme to hide himself for some secret feare of his own fault, whereof he saw no such cause in himselfe; he determined vpon the suretie of his owne conscience, to goe boldly vnto them, and to enquire what this matter might meane; whom as soone as they saw, they began to quarrell with, saying, that he entended to set distance betweene the King and them, and to bring them to confusion, but it should not lie in his power. And when hee began (as hee was a very well spoken man) in seemely wise to excuse himselfe, they tarried not the end of his answer, but shortly tooke him, and put him in ward: and that done, forthwith went to horse-backe, and tooke the way to Stony-Stratford, where they found the King with his Company, ready ready to leape on horſe-back, and depart forward to leaue that lodging for them, becauſe it was too ſtrait for both companies.

The Dukes come to the King.

(17) And as ſoone as they came in his preſence, they alighted downe with all their company about them; to whom the Duke of Buckingham ſaid, Goe afore, Gentlemen, and Yeomen keepe your roomes. In which goodly array they came to the King, and on their knees in very humble maner ſaluted his grace, who receiued them in very ioyous and amiable manner, nothing knowing, nor miſtruſting as yet what was done. But euen by and by in his preſence, they picked a quarrell to the Lord Grey, the Kings other brother by his mother, ſaying, that he with the Lord Marqueſſe his brother, and the Lord Riuers his Vncle, had compaſſed to rule the King and the Realme, and to ſet variance among the States, and to ſubdue and deſtroy the noble blood of the Realme: towards the accompliſhing whereof, they ſaid that the Lord Marqueſſe had entred into the Tower of London, and thence taken out the Kings Treaſure, and had ſent men to the ſea: All which things theſe Dukes well knew were done for neceſſary and good purpoſes, by the whole Councell at London, ſauing that ſomewhat they muſt ſay.

Accuſations againſt the Queenes kinred.

(18) Vnto which words the King anſwerd, What my brother Marques hath done I cannot ſay: but in good ſooth I dare well anſwer for mine Vncle Riuers, and my brother here, that they are innocent of any ſuch matter. Yea my Liege, quoth the Duke of Buckingham, they haue kept their dealings in theſe matters far from the knowledge of your good Grace. And forthwith they arreſted the Lord Richard, Sir Thomas Vaughan, and Sir Richard Hawt knights, in the Kings preſence, and brought the King and all his companie backe vnto Northampton, where they tooke againe further counſell. And there they ſent away from the King whom it pleaſed them, and ſet new ſeruants about him, ſuch as better liked them then him: At which dealing the King wept, and was nothing content; but it booted not: and at dinner the Duke of Gloceſter ſent a diſh from his owne Table to the Lord Riuers, bidding him be of good cheere, for all ſhould be well. But the Lord Riuers thanking the Duke, prayed the Meſſenger to beare it to the Lord Richard, with the ſame meſſage for his comfort, as one to whom ſuch aduerſity was ſtrange, but himſelfe had beene all his dayes inured therewith, and therefore could beare it the better: but for all this comfortable courteſie of the Duke of Glouceſter, hee ſent the Lord Riuers, and the Lord Richard, with Sir Thomas Vaughan, into the North Country, into diuers places to priſon, and afterward all to Pomfret, where they were in concluſion beheaded.

(19) In this wiſe the Duke of Gloceſter tooke vpon himſelfe the Order and Gouernance of the young King, whom with much honour and humble reuerence he conuayed towards London. But anon the tydings of this matter came haſtily to the Queene, a little before the midnight following, and that in the foreſt wiſe, that the King her Sonne was taken, her Brother, her Sonne, and other friends arreſted, and ſent, no man wiſt whither, to be done with God wot what. With which tidings, the Queene in great fright and heauineſſe, bewailed her childs raigne, her friends miſchance, and her owne misfortune, damning the time that euer ſhe diſſwaded the gathering of power about the King, got her ſelfe in all haſte poſſible with her young ſonne, and her daughters, out of the Palace of Weſtminſter, in which ſhe then lay, into the Sanctuary, lodging her ſelfe and company there in the Abbots Place.

Queene Elizabeth taketh Sanctuary.

(20) Now came there one likewiſe, not long after night from the Lord Chamberlaine, vnto the Archbiſhop of Yorke then Chancellor of England, to his Place not farre from Weſtminſter; and for that hee ſhewed his ſeruants, that he had tidings of great importance, that his Mr. gaue him in charge, not to forbeare his reſt, they letted not to awake him; nor he to admit the Meſſenger vnto his bedde-ſide. Of whom he heard that theſe Dukes were gone backe with the Kings Grace from Stony-Stratford vnto Northampton: notwithſtanding, Sir (quoth he) my Lord ſendeth your Lordſhip word, that there is no feare: for hee aſſureth you that all ſhall be well. I aſſure him (quoth the Archbiſhop) bee it as well as it will, it will neuer bee ſo well as we haue ſeene it. And thereupon by and by after the Meſſengers departure, he cauſed in all haſte all his ſeruants to be called vp, and ſo with his owne houſhold about him, euery euery man weaponed, hee tooke the Great Seale with him, and came yet before day vnto the Queene. About whom he found much heauineſſe, rumble, haſte and buſineſſe; carriage and conueiance of her ſtuffe into Sanctuary, cheſts, coffers, packes and fardels, truſſed all on mens backes, no man vn-occupied, ſome lading, ſome going, ſome diſcharging, ſome comming for more, ſome breaking down the wals to bring in the next way, and ſome drew to them to helpe to carry a wrong way. The Queene her ſelfe ſate alone alow, on the ruſhes, all deſolate and diſmayed, whom the Archbiſhop comforted in the beſt manner he could, ſhewing her that hee truſted, the matter was nothing ſo ſore as ſhee tooke it for, and that he was put in good hope, and out of feare, by a meſſage ſent him from the Lord Chamberlaine. Ah woe worth him (quoth the Queene) hee is one of them that laboureth to deſtroy me and my blood.

The Archbiſhops comforts to the Queene.

(21) Madam (quoth he) be of good cheare; for I aſſure you, if they crowne any other King then your ſonne, whom they haue now with them, wee ſhall on the morrow crowne his brother, whom you haue here with you: and here is the Great Seale, which in like ſort as that noble Prince your Husband deliuered it vnto mee, ſo here I deliuer it vnto you, to the vſe and behoofe of your Sonne, and therewith he betooke her the Great Seale, and departed home againe, euen in the dawning of the day: by which time hee might in his Chamber window ſee all the Thames full of boats of the Duke of Glocesters ſeruants, watching that no man ſhould goe to Sanctuary, nor none ſhould paſſe vnſearched. Then was there great commotion and murmure, aſwell in other places about, as eſpecially in the City, the people diuerſly diuining vpon this dealing. And ſome Lords, Knights and Gentlemen, either for fauour of the Queene, or for feare of themſelues, aſſembled in ſundry Companies, and went flocke-meale in harneſſe: and many alſo, for that they accounted this demeanour attempted, not ſo ſpecially againſt the other Lords, as againſt the King himſelfe in the diſturbance of his Coronation.

Great feare conceiued of the ouermuch murmuring made.

(22) But then, by and by the Lords aſſembled together, towards which meeting, the Archbiſhop of Yorke fearing that it would be aſcribed (as it was indeed) to his ouermuch lightneſſe, that he ſo ſuddenly had yeelded vp the great Seale to the Queene (to whom the cuſtody therof nothing appertained) without ſpeciall commandement of the King, ſecretly ſent for the Seale againe, and brought it with him after the accuſtomed manner. And at this meeting the Lord Haſtings, whoſe truth toward the King no man doubted, nor needed to doubt, perſwaded the Lords to beleeue, that the Duke of Glouceſter was ſure and faſtly faithfull to his Prince, and that the Lord Riuers, and Lord Richard, with the other Knights, were for matters attempted by them againſt the Dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham, put vnder arreſt for their ſurety, not for the Kings ieopardy; and that they were alſo in ſafeguard, and there no longer ſhould remaine, then till the matter were, not by the Dukes onely, but alſo by all the other Lords of the Kings Councell indifferently examined, and by other diſcretions ordered, either iudged or appeaſed. But one thing hee aduiſed them beware, that they iudged not the matter too farre forth ere they knew the truth, nor turning their priuate grudges into the common hurt, irking and prouoking men vnto anger; and diſturbing the Kings Coronation; towards which the Dukes were comming vp, that they might peraduenture bring the matter ſo farre out of ioynt, that it ſhould neuer bee brought in frame againe. Which ſtrife if it ſhould happen (as it were likely) to come to a field, though both parties were in all things equall, yet ſhould the authority be on that ſide where the King is himſelfe.

The Lord Chancellour ſendeth for the great Seale to the Queene.

Perſwaſions of the Lord Haſtings, that nothing was extremely meant.

(23) With theſe perſwaſions of the Lord Haſtings, whereof part himſelfe beleeued, of part hee wiſt the contrary, theſe commotions were ſomewhat appeaſed, but eſpecially by that, that the Dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham were ſo neere, and came ſo ſhortly on with the King, in none other maner, with none other voice, or any other ſemblance then to his Coronation; cauſing the fame to bee blowne about, that theſe Lords and Knights which were taken, had contriued the deſtruction of the Dukes of Glouceſter and Buckingham, and of other the Noble blood of the Realme, to the end that themſelues would alone demeane and gouerne the King at their pleaſure. And for the colourable proofe thereof, ſuch of the Dukes

This deuice, albeit it made the matter to wiſemen more vnlikely, well perceiuing that the intenders of ſuch a purpoſe would rather haue had their harneſſe on their backes, then to bee bound vp in barrels: yet much part of the Common people were therewith very well ſatisfied, and ſaid, It were almes to hang them.

How ſoone the Commons are brought into fooles Paradiſe.

(24) When the King approached too neere the Citie, Edmund Shaa Goldſmith, then Maior, with William White, and Iohn Matthew Sheriffes, and all the other Aldermen in Scarlet, with fiue hundred horſe of the Citizens, in Violet, receiued him reuerently at Harneſey, and riding from thence, accompanied him into the Citie, which he entred the fourth day of May, the firſt and laſt yeere of his raigne. The King was lodged in the Biſhops Palace, where was kept a great Councell, and there was ſworne to the King the Duke of Glouceſter, the Duke of Buckingham, and all the Lords. But the Duke of Glouceſter bare him in open ſight ſo reuerently to the Prince, with all ſemblance of lowlineſſe, that from the great obloquie in which he was ſo late before, hee was ſuddenly falne in ſo great truſt, that at the Councell next aſſembled, hee was made the onely man, choſen and thought moſt meet to be Protector of the King and his Realme, ſo that (were it deſtiny, or were it folly) the Lambe was betaken to the Wolfe to keepe. At which Councell alſo, the Archbiſhop of Yorke, Chancellor of England, which had deliuered vp the great Seale to the Queene, was thereof greatly reproued, and the Seale taken from him, and deliuered to Doctor Ruſſell Biſhop of Lincolne, a wiſe man, and of much experience, and vndoubtedly one of the beſt learned men that England had in his time: diuers Lords and Knights were appointed vnto diuers Roomes, the Lord Chamberlaine, and ſome others, keeping ſtill their Offices they had before.

King Edward met by the Citizens, and accompanied by them into London.

Richard Duke of Glouceſter made Protector of the King and Realme.

The great Seale is taken from the Archbiſhop of Yorke.

(25) Now although that the Protector ſo ſore thirſted for the finiſhing of thoſe deſignes which he had begun, and thought euery day a yeere till they were atchieued, yet durſt he no further attempt, ſo long as he had but halfe his prey in his hand: well witting, that if hee depoſed the one Brother, all the Realme would fall to the other, if he either remained in Sanctuary, or ſhould bee conueyed to his further libertie: wherefore, incontinent at the next meeting of the Lords in Councell, he propoſed vnto them, that it was a hainous deed of the Queene, and proceeded of great malice towards the Kings Councellors, that ſhe ſhould keepe in Sanctuary the Kings Brother from him, whoſe ſpeciall pleaſure and comfort were to haue his Brother with him: and that by her done, was to none other intent, but to bring all the Lords in obloquie, and murmure of the people, as though they were not to be truſted with the Kings Brother, who by aſſent of the Nobles of the Land, were appointed as the Kings neereſt friends, to the tuition of his owne Royall perſon. The proſperitie whereof ſtandeth (quoth hee) not all in keeping from enemies or ill viand, but partly alſo in recreation, and moderate pleaſure, which hee in his tender youth cannot take in the company of ancient perſons, but in the familiar conuerſation of thoſe that be neither farre vnder, nor farre aboue his age, and neuertheleſſe of eſtate conuenient to accompany his noble Maieſtie; wherefore with whom rather, then with his owne brother? And if any man thinke this conſideration (which I thinke no man thinketh that loueth the King) let him conſider, that ſometimes without ſmall things, greater cannot ſtand. And verily, it redoundeth greatly to the diſhonour both of the Kings Highneſſe, and of vs all that are about his Grace, to haue it runne in euery mans mouth, not in this Realme onely, but alſo in other Lands, (as euill words walke far) that the Kings brother ſhall bee faine to keepe Sanctuary; for euery man, I deeme, will ſuppoſe, that there is occaſion giuen, why it ſhould ſo bee: and ſuch euill opinions once faſtened in mens hearts, hardly can bee ſcrewed out againe, and may grow to more griefe then any man here can diuine. Wherefore I thinke it were not the worſt to ſend vnto the Queene for the redreſſe of this matter, ſome honourable truſty trusty man, such as both tendreth the Kings weale, and the honour of this Councell, and is also in fauour and credence with her. For all which considerations, none seemeth to mee more meete, then is our reuerend Father here present, my Lord Cardinall, who may in this matter doe most good of any man, if it please him to take the paines, which I doubt not of his goodnesse hee will not refuse, for the Kings sake and ours, and weale of the young Duke himselfe, the Kings most honourable brother, and after my Soueraigne himselfe, my most deare Nephew, considering that thereby shall be ceased the slanderous rumour and obloquie now going, & the hurts auoided that thereof might ensue, and much rest and quiet grow to all the Realme. And if she be percase so obstinate, and so precisely set vpon her owne will, that neither his wise and faithfull aduertisement cannot mooue her, nor any mans reason content her: then shall we by mine aduice, and by the Kings authoritie, fetch him out of that Prison, and bring him to his noble presence, in whose continuall company he shall be so well cherished, and so honourably intreated, that all the world shall to our honour, and her reproach perceiue, that it was onely malice, frowardnesse, or folly, that caused her to keepe him there: this is my minde in this matter for this time, except any of your Lordships any thing perceiue to the contrary, for neuer shall I by Gods grace, so wed my selfe to my owne will, but that I shall be ready to change it vpon your better aduices.

If the Queene refuse to deliuer the Duke, what is to be done?

All the Councell allow of the Protectors speech.

(26) When the Protector had said, all the Councell affirmed, that the motion was good and reasonable, and to the King and the Duke his Brother honourable, and the thing that should cease great murmure in the Realme, if the mother might bee by good meanes induced to deliuer him. Which thing the Archbishop of Yorke, whom they all agreed also to be thereto most conuenient, tooke vpon him to mooue her, and therein to doe his vttermost endeauour: howbeit, if shee could by no meanes be entreated with her good will to deliuer him, then thought he, and sueh other of the Clergie then present, that it were not in any wise to be attempted, to take him out against her will. For it would be a thing that should turne to the great grudge of all men, and high displeasure of God, if the priuiledge of that holy place should now bee broken, which had so many yeeres beene kept, which both Kings and Popes so good had granted, so many had confirmed, and which holy ground was more then fiue hundred yeeres agoe, by S^t. Peter in his owne person, in spirit accompanied with great multitude of Angels, by nigi- so specially hallowed and dedicated to God, (for the proofe whereof, they haue yet in the Abbey, Saint Peters Cope to shew) that from that time hitherward, was there neuer so vndeuout a King, that durst violate the sacred place, or so holy a Bishop, that durst presume to consecrate it; and therefore (quoth the Archbishop of Yorke) God forbid that any man should for any thing earthly, enterprize to breake the immunitie and liberty of that sacred Sanctuary, that hath been the safe-gard of many a good mans life: and I trust (quoth he) with Gods grace we shall not need it. But for what need soeuer, I would not we should doe it; I trust that shee shall be with reason contented, and all things in good manner obtained; but if it happen that I bring it not so to passe, yet shall I toward it with my best, and you shall all well perceiue, that there shall be of my indeauour no lacke, if the Mothers dread, and womanish feare be not the let.

A great offence to breake the Sanctuary.

Saint Peters owne Cope was to be seene in Westminster.

(27) Womanish feare, nay womanish frowardnesse (quoth the Duke of Buckingham) for I dare take it vpon my soule, she well knoweth there is no need of any feare, either for her sonne, or for her selfe. For as for her, here is no man that will bee at warre with a woman: Would God some of the men of her kin were women too, and then should all be soone in rest: Howbeit, there is none of her kin the lesse loued, for that they be of her kin, but for their owne euill-deseruing. And nay the lesse, if we loued neither her, nor her kinne, yet were there no cause to thinke that we should hate the Kings noble Brother, to whose Grace we our selues be of kin: whose honour, if she as much desired, as our dishonour, and as much regard tooke to his wealth, as to her owne will, she would be as loth to suffer him from the King, as any of vs be. For, if she haue wit, (as would God she had as good will as she hath shrewd wit) shee reckoneth her self no wiser, then she thinketh some that be here, of whose faithfull minde she nothing doubteth, but verily beleeueth

ueth and knoweth, that they would be as ſorry of his harme, as her ſelfe, and yet would haue him from her, if ſhe bide there: and wee all (I thinke) content, that both bee with her, if ſhee come thence, and bide in ſuch place, where they may be with their honour. Now then, if ſhe refuſe in the deliuerance of him, to follow the counſell of them, whoſe wiſedome ſhee knoweth, whoſe truth ſhe well truſteth: it is eaſie to perceiue, that frowardneſſe letteth her, and not feare. But goe to, ſuppoſe that ſhee feare, (as who may let her to feare her owne ſhadow?) the more ſhe feareth to deliuer him, the more ought we to feare to leaue him in her hands: For, if ſhe caſt ſuch fond doubts, that ſhe feare his hurt; then will ſhee feare that hee ſhall be fetcht thence. For ſhee will ſoone thinke, that if men were ſet (which God forbid) vpon ſo great a miſchiefe, the Sanctuary would little let them: which good men might (as I thinke) without ſinne, ſomewhat leſſe regard then they doe. Then, if ſhee doubt, leſt hee might be fetched from her, is it not likely that ſhe ſhall ſend him ſomewhere out of the Realme? Verily, I looke for none other. And I doubt not, but ſhe now as ſore mindeth it, as we the let thereof. And if ſhe might happen to bring that to paſſe (as it were no great Maſtery, we letting her alone) all the world would ſay, that we were a wiſe ſort of Councellors about a King, that ſuffer his Brother to bee caſt away vnder our noſes. And therefore I aſſure you faithfully for my minde, I will rather, maugre her mind, fetch him away, then leaue him there, till her frowardnes and fond feare conuay him away. And yet will I breake no Sanctuary therefore: for verily, ſith the priuiledges of that place, and other-like haue beene of long continued, I am not he that will go about to break them: And in good faith, if they were now to begin, I would not be hee that ſhould be about to make them. Yet will I not ſay nay, but that it is a deed of pitty, that ſuch men, as the ſea, or their euill debters haue brought in pouerty, ſhould haue ſome place of liberty, to keepe their bodies out of the danger of their cruell Creditors. And alſo, if the Crowne happen (as it hath done) to come in queſtion, while either part taketh other as Traitours, I like well there be ſome places of refuge for both. But as for theeues, of which theſe places bee full, and which neuer fall from the craft after they once fall thereunto; it is pittie the Sanctuary ſhould ſerue them, and much more man-quellers, whom God bade to take from the Altar and kill them, if their murther were wilfull. And where it is otherwiſe, there need wee not the Sanctuaries, that God appointed in the old Law: for if either neceſſity, his owne defence, or miſ-fortune draweth him to that deed, a pardon ſerueth, which either the law granteth of courſe, or the King of pittie may. Then looke we now how few ſanctuary men there be, whom any fauourable neceſſity compelled to goe thither; and then ſee on the other ſide, what a ſort there be commonly therein of them, whom wilfull vnthriftineſſe hath brought to nought: what rabble of theeues, murtherers, and malicious hainous Traitors, and that in two places eſpecially? the one at the elbow of the Citie, the other in the very bowels. I dare well auow it, weigh the good that they doe, with the hurt that commeth of them, and yee ſhall finde it much better to lacke both, then to haue both. And this I ſay, Although they were not abuſed as they now be, and ſo long haue beene, that I feare me euer they will be, while men bee afraid to ſet the hands to amend them, as though God and Saint Peter were the patrons of vngracious liuing. Now vnthrifts ryot, and runne in debt, vpon the boldneſſe of theſe places; yea, and rich men runne thither with poore mens goods, there they build, there they ſpend, and bid their Creditors goe whiſtle. Mens wiues runne thither with their husbands plate, and ſay, they dare not abide with their Husbands for beating. Theeues bring thither their ſtolne goods, and liue thereon riotouſly: there they deuiſe new robberies, nightly they ſteale out, they robbe and riue, kill and come in againe, as though thoſe places gaue them not onely a ſafe-guard for the harme they haue done, but a licence alſo to doe more; howbeit much of this miſchiefe, if Wiſe-men would ſet their hands to it, might be amended, with great thankes of God, and no breach of the Priuiledge. The reſidue, ſith ſo long agoe, I wot ne're what Pope, and what Prince more pittyous then politique hath granted it, and other men ſince, of a certaine religious feare, haue not broken it; Let vs therefore take paine there-with, and let it a Gods name ſtand ſtand in force, as farre forth as reaſon will, which is not fully ſo farre forth, as may ſerue to let vs of the fetching forth of this Nobleman, to his honour and wealth, out of that place, in which hee neither is, nor can be a Sanctuary man. A Sanctuary ſerueth alwayes to defend the body of that man that ſtandeth in danger abroad, not of great hurt onely, but alſo of lawfull hurt; for againſt vnlawfull harmes, neuer Pope nor King intended to priuiledge any one place, for that Priuiledge hath euery place: knoweth any man any place, wherein it is lawfull for one man to doe another wrong? That no man vnlawfully take hurt, that libertie, the King, the Law, and very nature forbiddeth in euery place, and maketh to that regard, for euery man, euery place a Sanctuary: but where a man is by lawfull meanes in perill, there needeth hee the tuition of ſome ſpeciall Priuiledge, which is the onely ground & cauſe of all Sanctuaries: from which neceſſitie this noble Prince is farre, whoſe loue to the King, nature and kindred prooueth, whoſe innocency to all the World, his tender youth proueth, and ſo Sanctuary, as for him, neither none he needeth, nor none can he haue. Men come not to Sanctuary, as they come to Baptiſme, to require it by their God-fathers; hee muſt aske it himſelfe, that muſt haue it; and reaſon, ſith no man hath cauſe to haue it, but whoſe conſcience of his owne fault maketh him faine neede to require it: what will then hath yonder Babe? which, and if he had diſcretion to require it, if need were, I dare ſay would now bee right angry with them that keepe him there: and I would thinke without any ſcruple of conſcience, without any breach of Priuiledge, to be ſomewhat more homely with them, that be there Sanctuary-men indeed: for if one goe to Sanctuary with another mans goods, why ſhould not the King, leauing his body at liberty, ſatisfie the party of his goods, euen within the Sanctuary? for neither King nor Pope can giue any place ſuch a priuiledge, that it ſhall diſcharge a man of his debts, being able to pay. And with that, diuers of the Clergy that were preſent, whether they ſaid it for his pleaſure, or as they thought, agreed plainly, that by the Law of God, and of the Church, the goods of a Sanctuary-man, ſhould bee deliuered in payment of his debts, and ſtolne goods to the owner, and onely liberty reſerued him, to get his liuing with the labour of his hands. Verily (quoth the Duke) I thinke you ſay very truth; and what if a mans wife would take Sanctuary, becauſe ſhee liſt to runne from her Husband? I would weene, if ſhe could alledge none other cauſe, hee may lawfully without any diſpleaſure to Saint Peter, take her out of Saint Peters Church by the arme. And if no body may bee taken out of Sanctuary, that ſaith he will bide there, then if a childe will take Sanctuary, becauſe hee feareth to goe to Schoole, his Maſter muſt let him alone. And as ſimple as the ſample is, yet is there leſſe reaſon in our caſe then in that; for therein, though it be a childiſh feare; yet is there at the leaſt-wiſe ſome feare, and herein is there none at all. And verily, I haue often heard of Sanctuary-men, but I neuer heard earſt of Sanctuary Children. And therefore, as for the Concluſion of my minde, whoſo may haue deſerued to neede it, if they thinke it for their ſuretie, let them keepe it; but he can be no Sanctuary-man, that had neither wiſedome to deſire it, nor malice to deſerue it, whoſe life or libertie, can by no lawfull proceſſe ſtand in jeopardie: and hee that taketh one out of the Sanctuary to doe him good, I ſay plainely that he breaketh no Sanctuary.

(28) When the Duke had done, the temporall men wholly, and moſt part of the ſpirituall alſo, thinking no hurt earthly meant towards the young Babe, condiſcended in effect, that if he were not deliuered, hee ſhould bee fetched; howbeit they all thought it beſt, in the auoyding of all manner of rumour, that the Lord Cardinall ſhould firſt aſſay to get him with her good will. And thereupon, all the Councell came vnto the Starre-Chamber at Weſtminſter, and the Lord Cardinall leauing the Protector with the Councell in the Starre-Chamber, departed into the Sanctuary to the Queene with diuers other Lords with him, were it for the reſpect of his honour, or that ſhee ſhould by preſence of ſo many, perceiue that this errand was not one mans minde: or were it, for that the Protector intended not in this matter to truſt any one man alone, or elſe, that if ſhee finally were determined to keepe him, ſome of that Company had haply ſecret inſtructions incontinent, maugre her minde, to take him, him, and to leaue her no reſpit to conuey him, which ſhee was likely to minde, after this matter broken to her, if the time would in any wiſe ſerue her.

The Cardinall doth his errand to the Queene.

(29) When the Queene and thoſe Lords were come together in preſence, the Lord Cardinall ſhewed her, that it was thought vnto the Protector, and vnto the whole Councell, that her keeping of the Kings Brother in that place, was the thing which highly ſounded, not onely to the great rumour of the people, and their obloquie, but alſo to the importable griefe and diſpleaſure of the Kings Royall Majeſtie, to whoſe Grace it were a ſingular comfort, to haue his naturall Brother in Company, as it was both his diſhonour, all theirs, and hers alſo, to ſuffer him in Sanctuary, as though the one Brother ſtood in danger and perill of the other. And he ſhewed her, that the Councell therefore had ſent him to require her the deliuery of the young Duke, that hee might bee brought vnto the Kings preſence at his libertie, out of that place, which they reckoned as a priſon, and there hee ſhould bee demeaned, according to his eſtate: and ſhee in this doing ſhould both doe great good to the Realme, pleaſure to the Councell, and profit to her ſelfe, ſuccour to her friends that were in diſtreſſe; and beſides that (which hee wiſt well ſhee ſpecially tendred) not onely great comfort and honour to the King, but alſo to the young Duke himſelfe, whoſe great wealth it were to be together, aſwell for many greater cauſes, as alſo for both their diſports and recreations; which thing the Lords eſteemed not ſlight, though it ſeemed light; well pondering that their youth without recreation and play, cannot endure, nor any ſtranger, for the conjecture of both their ages and eſtates, ſo meet in that point for any of them, as either of them for other.

The Queenes anſwer to the Cardinall.

(30) My Lord (quoth the Queene) I ſay not nay, but that it were very conuenient, that this Gentleman whom yee require, were in company of the King his Brother; and in good faith, I thinke it were as great commoditie to them both, for yet a while to be in the cuſtodie of their mother, the tender age conſidered of the elder of them both, but ſpecially the younger, which beſides his Infancie, that alſo needeth good looking to, hath a while beene ſo ſore diſeaſed, vexed with ſickneſſe, and is ſo newly rather a little amended, then well-recouered, that I dare put no perſon earthly in truſt with his keeping but my ſelfe onely, conſidering that there is (as Phyſicians ſay) and as wee alſo finde, double the perill in the recidiuation, that was in the firſt ſickeneſſe, with which diſeaſe, nature being ſore laboured, fore-wearied and weakned, waxeth the leſſe able to beare out and ſuſtaine a new ſurfeit. And albeit there might be found other that would haply doe their beſt vnto him, yet is there none that either knoweth better how to order him, then I that ſo long haue kept him, or is more like tenderly to cheriſh him, then his owne mother that bare him.

(31) No man denieth, good Madam (quoth the Cardinall) but that your Grace were of all others moſt neceſſary about your Children, and ſo would all the Councell not onely be content, but glad that you were, if it might ſtand with your pleaſure, to be in ſuch place as might ſtand with their honour: but if you doe appoint your ſelfe to tarry here, then they thinke it were more conuenient that the Duke of Yorke were with the King, honourably at his libertie, to the comfort of them both, rather then here as a Sanctuary man, to both their diſhonour and obloquy, ſith there is not alwayes ſo great a neceſſitie to haue the childe with his mother, but that occaſion may ſometimes be ſuch, that it ſhould bee more expedient to keepe him elſe-where, which well appeareth in this, that at ſuch time as your deareſt Sonne then Prince, and now King, ſhould for his honour, and good order of the Countrey, keepe his reſidence in Wales, farre out of your company, your Grace was well contented therewith your ſelfe.

(32) Not very well contented (quoth the Queene) and yet the caſe is not like, for the one was then in health, and the other is now ſicke: in which caſe I maruell greatly, that my Lord Protector is ſo deſirous to haue him in his keeping, where if the Childe in his ſickneſſe miſcarry by nature, yet might hee runne into ſlander and ſuſpition of fraud. And where they call it a thing ſo ſore againſt my Childes honour, and theirs alſo, that he abideth in this place: it is all their honours there to ſuffer him abide, abide, where no man doubteth he ſhall be beſt kept, and that is here, while I am here, which as yet intend not to come forth, and jeopard my ſelfe after other of my friends, which would God were rather here in ſuretie with mee, then I there in jeopardie with them.

(33) Why Madame (quoth another Lord) know you any thing why they ſhould be in jeopardy? Nay verily (quoth ſhe) nor why they ſhould be in Priſon, as now they bee: But it is I trow no great maruell though I feare, leſt thoſe that haue not letted to put them in durance without colour, will let as little to procure their deſtruction without cauſe. The Cardinall made a countenance to the other Lord, that he ſhould harpe no more vpon that ſtring, and then ſaid he to the Queene, that he nothing doubted, but that thoſe Lords of her Honourable Kinne, which as yet remained vnder arreſt, ſhould vpon the matter examined doe well enough, and as towards her Noble Perſon, neither was, neither could be any jeopardy.

(34) Whereby ſhould I truſt that (quoth the Queene?) in that I am guiltleſſe? as though they were guiltie: in that I am with their enemies better loued then they? when they hate them for my ſake; in that I am ſo neere a kinne to the King? and how farre they be off, if that would helpe, as God grant it hurt not, and therefore as for me, I purpoſe not as yet to depart hence. And as for this Gentleman my ſonne, I minde that he ſhall be where I am, till I ſee further: for I aſſure you, for that I ſee ſome Men ſo greedy, without any ſubſtantiall cauſe to haue him, makes mee much more fearefull to deliuer him. Truly Madam, (quoth he) the more vnwilling that you be to deliuer him, the more vnwilling other men be to ſuffer you to keepe him, leſt your cauſleſſe feare might cauſe you farther to conney him: and many there be that thinke he can haue no priuiledge in this place, which neither can haue will to aske it, nor malice to deſerue it; and therefore, they reckon no priuiledge broken, though they fetch him out, which if you finally refuſe to deliuer him, I verily thinke they will: ſo much dread hath my Lord his Vncle, for the tender loue he beareth him, leſt your Grace ſhould hope to ſend him away.

(35) Ah ſir, (quoth the Queene) hath the Protector ſo tender zeale, that he feareth nothing but leſt hee ſhould eſcape him? thinketh he that I would ſend him hence, which is not in plight to ſend out, and in what place could I account him ſure, if he be not ſure in the Sanctuary? which there was neuer Tyrant yet ſo diueliſh, that durſt preſume to breake. And I truſt, GOD is as ſtrong now to withſtand his aduerſaries, as euer hee was. But my ſonne can deſerue no Sanctuary, and therefore he cannot haue it. Forſooth hee hath found out a goodly gloſſe, by which that place that may defend a thiefe, may not ſaue an innocent: but he is in no jeopardy, nor hath no need thereof: would God he had not. Thinketh the Protector, (I pray God he may proue a Protector) thinketh he, that I perceiue not whereunto his painted Proceſſe draweth? It is not honorable that the Duke abide here: It were comfortable for them both, that hee were with his Brother, becauſe the King lacketh a play-fellow forſooth. I pray God ſend them both better play-fellows then him, that maketh ſo high a matter, vpon ſo trifling pretext: as though there could none be found to play with the King, but his Brother, (that hath no liſt to play for ſickneſſe) come out of Sanctuary, out of his ſafe-guard to play with him? As though Princes, as young as they be, could not play but with their Peeres, or Children could not play but with their kindred, with whom for the moſt part they agree much worſe then with ſtrangers? But the Child cannot require the Priuiledge: Who told him ſo? he ſhall heare him aske it, if he will. Howbeit, this is a gay matter: ſuppoſe hee could not aske it, ſuppoſe he would not aske it, ſuppoſe he would aske to goe out, if I ſay hee ſhall not: If I aske the Priuiledge but for my ſelfe, I ſay, he that taketh him out againſt my will, breaketh the Sanctuary. Serueth this liberty for my Perſon onely, or for my goods alſo? you may not take hence my Horſe from me; and may you take my Child from me? He alſo is my ward: for as my learned Counſel ſheweth me, ſith he hath nothing by diſcent holden by Knights ſeruice, the law maketh his mother his Gardian. Then may no man (I ſuppoſe) take my Ward from me out of Sanctuary, without the breach of Sanctuary. And if my Priuiledge could not ſerue him, nor he aske it for himſelf, yet ſith the Law committeth to me the cuſtody of him, I may require it for him, except the Law giue a childe a Gar-dian onely for his goods and Lands, discharging him of the cure and safe-keeping of his body, for which onely both lands and goods serue. And if examples be sufficient, to obtaine Priuiledge for my child, I need not farre to seeke them, for in this place in which now we be (and which is now in question, whether my childe may take benefit of it) mine other Sonne now King, was borne, kept in his Cradle, and preserued to a more prosperous fortune, which I pray God long to continue. And as you all know, this is not the first time that I haue taken Sanctuary. For when my Lord my Husband was banished, and thrust out of his Kingdome, I fled hither, being great with Childe: and here I bare the Prince: and when my Lord my Husband returned safe againe, and had the Victory, then went I hence, to welcome him home, and from thence I brought my Babe the Prince vnto his Father, when he first tooke him in his Armes. And I pray God that my Sonnes Palace may be as great a safe-guard vnto him now raigning, as this place was sometime to the Kings enemy. In which place I intend to keepe his brother, since mans Law serueth the Gardian to keepe the Infant. The Law of Nature wils the Mother to keepe her childe, Gods Law priuiledgeth the Sanctuary, and the Sanctuary my Sonne, sith I feare to put him in the Protectors hands, who hath his brother already, and were (if both fayled) inheritour to the Crowne, and the cause of my feare, hath no man to doe to examine. But yet I feare no further then the Law feareth, which as learned men tell mee, forbiddeth euery man the custody of them by whose death he may inherite lesse land then a Kingdome. I can no more: but whosoeuer he be that breaketh this holy Sanctuary, I pray God shortly send him need of a Sanctuary when he may not come to it, for taken out of Sanctuary I would not that my mortal enemy were.

(36) The Lord Cardinall perceiuing that the Queene waxed euer the longer the further off, and also that shee began to kindle and chafe, and speake more biting words against the Protector, and such as he neuer beleeued, and was also loth to heare, he said to her for a finall conclusion, that hee no longer would dispute the matter, but if shee were content to deliuer the Duke to him, and to the other Lords present, he durst lay his body and soule both in pledge, not onely for his surety, but also for his estate; And if she would giue a resolute answer to the contrary, he would forthwith depart therewithall, and shift who-so would with this businesse afterward, for he neuer intended more to mooue her in that matter, in which she thought that he and all others also, saue her selfe, lacked either wit or truth; wit, if they were so dull that they could perceiue nothing what the Protector intended: truth, if they should procure her Sonne to be deliuered into his hands, in whom they should perceiue towards the Childe any euill intended.

(37) The Queene with these words stood a good while in a deep study. And for as much as her seemed the Cardinall ready to depart, and the Protector himselfe ready at hand, so as shee verily thought she could not keepe him there, but that he should incontinent be taken thence, and to conuey him else-where, neither had shee time to serue her, nor place determined, nor persons appointed, all things vnready, this message came on her so suddenly, nothing lesse looked for, then to haue him fetcht out of Sanctuary, which shee thought to be now be-set in such places about, that he could not be conueyed out vntaken, and partly (as she thought) it might fortune her feare to be false, so well she wist it was either needlesse or bootlesse: Wherfore, if she must needs goe from him, she deemed it best to deliuer him; and besides the Cardinals faith, shee nothing doubted, neither some other Lords, whom shee saw there present, which as shee feared lest they might be deceiued, so was she well assured they would not bee corrupted: and thought it would make them the more warily to looke to him, and the more circumspectly to see to his suretie, if with her owne hands she betooke him to them of trust. And lastly, taking the young Duke by the hand, said vnto the Lords:

Queene Elizabeth yeeldeth to deliuer the young Duke.

(38) My Lords, and all my Lords; I neither am so vnwise to mistrust your wits, nor so suspicious to mistrust your truths: of which thing I purpose to make you such a proofe, as if either of both lacked in you, might both turne me to great sorrow, the Realm to much harme, & you all to great reproach. For loe, here is (quoth she) this Gentleman, whom I doubt not, but I could here keepe keepe safe if I would; whatsoeuer any man say: and I doubt not also, but there be some abroad so deadly enemies vnto my blood, that if they wist where any of it lay in their owne bodies, they would let it out. We haue also experience, that the desire of a Kingdome knoweth no kindred: the Brother hath beene the Brothers bane: and may the Nephewes be sure of their Vncle? Each of these Children is the others defence, whilest they are asunder, and each of their liues lieth in the others body: keepe one safe, and both be sure, and nothing for them both more perillous, then to bee in one place: For what wise Merchant aduentureth all his goods in one Ship? All this notwithstanding, I deliuer him, and his brother in him, to keepe, into your hands, of whom I shall aske both, before God and the world. Faithfull ye be, that wot I well, and I know well you be wise; power and strength to keepe him, if yee list, neither lacke yee of your selfe, nor lack helpe in this case. And if you cannot else-where, then may you leaue him here: but only one thing, I beseech you, for the trust that his father euer put in you, and for the trust I now put you in, that as far as you thinke I feare too much, be you well wary that you feare not too little: and therewithall shee said vnto the Childe, Farewell, mine owne sweet Sonne, God send you good keeping: let me kisse you yet once, ere you goe; for God knoweth when we shall kisse together againe. And therewithall she kissed him, and blessed him, turned her back and wept, and went her way, leauing the Childe weeping as fast. When the Lord Cardinall, and those other Lords with him, had receiued the young Duke, they brought him into the Star-chamber, where the Protector took him in his armes, and kissed him, with these words: Now welcome my Lord, euen with all my heart: In which saying, it is like hee spake as hee thought. Thereupon forth-with they brought him vnto the King his brother, into the Bishops Palace at Pauls; and from thence both of them thorow the Citie of London, honourably attended into the Tower, out of which after that day they neuer came againe.

The ambitious desire for a Crowne.

Richard Duke of Yorke deliuered to the Cardinall.

A Iudas kisse.

(39) The Protector hauing both the Children now in his hands, opened himselfe more boldly, both to certaine other men, and also chiefly to the Duke of Buckingham: Although I know that many thought that this Duke was priuy to all the Protectors counsell, euen from the beginning, and some of the Protectors friends said, that the Duke was the first mouer of the Protector to this matter; sending a priuy messenger vnto him streight after King Edwards death. But others againe, which knew better the subtill wit of the Protector, deny that he euer opened his enterprize to the Duke, vntill he had brought to passe the things before rehearsed. But when he had imprisoned the Queenes kindred, and gotten both her sonnes into his owne hands; then hee opened the rest of his purpose, with lesse feare, to them whom he thought meet for the matter, and especially to the Duke, who being wonne to his designes, he held his strength more then halfe increased. The matter was broken vnto the Duke by subtill persons, and such as were their crafts-masters in the handling of such wicked deuices: who declared vnto him, that the young King was offended with him, for his kinsfolkes sakes, and if hee were euer able, hee would reuenge them; who would pricke him forward therunto if they escaped (for they would remember their imprisonment) or else if they were put to death, without doubt the young King would be carefull for their deaths, whose imprisonmẽts were grieuous vnto him. And that with repenting the Duke should nothing auaile, for there was no way left to redeeme his offence by benefits, but he should sooner destroy himselfe then saue the King, who with his Brother, and his kinsfolks he saw in such places imprisoned, as the Protector might with a becke destroy them all: and without all doubt would doe it indeed, if there were any new enterprize attẽpted. And that it was likely as the Protector had prouided priuy gard for himself, so had he spials for the Duke and traines to haue caught him, if hee should be against him, and that peraduenture from them whom hee left suspected. For the state of things, and the dispositions of men then were such, that a man could not wel tell whom he might trust, or whom he might feare. These things, and such like, being beaten into the Dukes minde, brought him to that point, that where he had repented the way that he had entred, yet would hee go forward in the same, and since he had once begun, he would stoutly go thorow. And therefore to this wicked enterprize which he beleeued could not be auoyded, he bent himſelfe, determining, ſith the common miſchiefe could not be amended, he would turne it as much as he might to his owne commoditie.

The couenants betwixt the Protector and the Duke of Buckingham.

(40) Then was it agreed, that the Protector ſhould haue the Dukes ayde to make him King, and that the Protectors onely lawfull ſonne ſhould marry the Dukes daughter; and that the Protector ſhould grant him the quiet poſſeſſion of the Earledome of Hertford, which he claimed as his inheritance, and could neuer obtaine it in King Edwards time. Beſides theſe requeſts of the Duke, the Protector of his owne accord, promiſed him a great quantitie of the Kings treaſurie, and of his houſhold ſtuffe. And when they were thus at a point betwixt themſelues, they went about to prepare for the Coronation of the young King, as they would haue it ſeeme. And that they might turne both the eyes and mindes of men from perceiuing of their drifts other-where, the Lords were ſent for from all parts of the Realme, and came flocking vnto the ſolemnitie. But the Protector and Duke, after they had ſent the Lord Cardinall Archbiſhop of Yorke, then Lord Chancellor, the Biſhop of Ely, the Lords Stanley, and Haſtings, then Lord Chamberlaine, with many other Noblemen, to confer and deuiſe about the Coronation in one place, as faſt they were in another place contriuing the contrary, to make the Protector King: to which counſell, albeit there were adhibited very few, and they very ſecret; yet began here and there, ſome muttering among the people, as though all ſhould not long be well, though they neither knew what they feared, nor wherefore: were it that before ſuch great things, mens hearts of a ſecret inſtinct of nature miſ-giue them; as the Sea without winde ſwelleth of himſelfe ſometime before a tempeſt; or were it that ſome one man haply ſomewhat perceiuing, filled many men with ſuſpition, though he ſhewed few men what hee knew. Howbeit ſomewhat the dealing it ſelfe made men to muſe on the matter, though the counſell were cloſe: For by little and little, all men with-drew from the Tower, and repaired to Crosbies in Biſhopſgate ſtreete, where the Protector kept his houſe in great ſtate. So that the Protector had the reſort, and the King left in a manner deſolate. And whileſt ſome for their buſineſſe made ſuite to ſuch as were in office for the King, ſome were ſecretly by their friends warned, that it might haply doe them no good, to bee too much attendant about the King without the Protectors appointment, who then began to remooue many of the Princes old ſeruants, and in their ſtead to place about him new.

The miſtruſt of the times.

All flocke to the Protector.

(41) Thus many things meeting together, partly by purpoſe, and partly by chance, cauſed at length not onely the common people, that mooue with the wind, but wiſemen alſo, and ſome Lords likewiſe, to marke and muſe at the matter; inſomuch, that the Lord Stanley, who was after Earle of Darby, ſaid to the Lord Haſtings, that he much miſliked theſe two ſeuerall counſels. For while we (quoth he) talke of one matter in the one place, little wot we, whereof they talke in the other place. My Lord (quoth the Lord Haſtings) of my life neuer doubt you: for while * one man is there, which is neuer thence, neuer can things bee mooued that ſhould ſound amiſſe againſt me, but it ſhall bee in mine eares ere it be well out of their mouths: this meant he by Catesby, which was of his neere counſell, and whom he very familiarly vſed, and in his moſt waighty matters put no man in ſo ſpeciall truſt, nor no man ſo much beholden vnto him as Catesby was. A man indeed well learned in the Lawes of this Land, and by ſpeciall fauour of the L. Chamberlaine, in good authoritie, and bare much rule in Leiceſterſhire, where the Lord Haſtings power chiefly lay. But ſurely great pitty it was, that he had not had either more truth, or leſſe wit. For his diſſimulation onely kept all that miſchiefe vp: in whom, if the Lord Haſtings had not put ſo ſpeciall truſt, the Lord Stanley and he had departed, with diuers other Lords, and had broken all the dance, for many ill ſignes that hee ſaw, which he now conſtrues all to the beſt: So ſurely thought hee that there could be no harme towards him intended, in that counſell where Catesby was. And of truth, the Protector and Duke of Buckingham made very good ſemblance vnto the Lord Haſtings, whom vndoubtedly the Protector loued well, and loth was to haue loſt him, but for feare leſt his life ſhould haue quailed their purpoſe; for which cauſe he moued Catesby to proue with ſome words, caſt out a farre off, whether hee could thinke it poſſible possible to win the Lord Chamberlaine to their part. But Catesby, whether hee assayed him, or assayed him not, reported vnto them, as he found him so fast, and heard him speake so terrible words, that hee durst no further breake. True it is, that the Lord Chamberlaine, of very trust shewed vnto Catesby, the distrust that others began to haue in the matter: and therefore Catesby fearing, as he affirmed, lest their motion might with the Lord Hastings diminish his credence, whereunto only all the matter leaned; he counselled and procured the Protector hastily to rid him. And much the rather, for that he trusted by his death, to obtaine much of the rule that the Lord Hastings bare in his Countrey: the onely desire whereof, was the allectiue that induced him to bee partner, and one speciall contriuer of all this horrible treason.

Catesby set to sound the Lord Hastings.

Catesby false to his founder.

(42) Soone after this, vpon Friday the thirteenth day of Iune, many Lords assembled in the Tower, and there sate in Councel, deuising the honourable solemnitie of the Kings Coronation; of the which the time appointed was so neere, that the Pageants and subtilties were in making day and night at Westminster, and much victuall killed, that afterward was cast away. These Lords sitting together communing of this matter, the Protector came in amongst them about nine of the clocke, saluting them courteously, and excusing himselfe, that he had beene from them so long, saying merrily, I haue beene a sleeper this day. And after a little talke with them, hee said to the Bishop of Ely; My Lord, you haue very good Strawberies at your Garden in Holborne: I pray you let vs haue a messe of them. Gladly my Lord, said the Bishop, would God I had some better thing as ready to pleasure you as that: and therewith in all haste he sent his seruant for a messe of Strawberies. Whereupon the Protector setting the Lords fast in conference, prayed them to spare him for a little while, and departed thence. But soone after, betwixt ten and eleuen, he returned into the Councell-Chamber amongst them, with a wonderfull sowre and angry countenance, knitting the browes, frowning and fretting, and gnawing on his lippes, sate him downe in his place, all the Lords much dismaied, sore maruelling of this his sudden change, and what thing should him ayle. He sitting thus a while, began thus to speake: What are they worthy to haue, that compasse and imagine the destruction of me, being so neere of blood vnto the King, and Protector of his Royall Person and his Realme? At which question, all the Lords sate sore astonied, musing much by whom this question should be meant, of which euery man knew himselfe cleare.

The Protector now another man.

(43) Then the Lord Chamberlaine, as hee that for the loue betwixt them, thought he might be boldest with him, answered and said, That they were worthy to be punished as haynous Traitors whatsoeuer they were: and the same all the other Lords affirmed. That is (quoth the Protector) yonder Sorceresse my brothers wife, meaning the Queene, and others with her. At these words many of the Lords that fauoured her, were greatly abashed: but the L. Hastings was in his minde better content, that it was moued by her, then by any other whom he loued better: howbeit, his heart somewhat grudged, that hee was not afore made of counsell in this matter, as he was of the taking of her kindred, and of their putting to death, which were by his assent before deuised to be beheaded at Pomfret the selfe-same day, in which he was not aware, how it was by other deuised, that himselfe should be beheaded the same day at London. Then said the Protector, Yee shall all see in what wise that Sorceresse, and that other Witch of her counsell, Shores wife, with their affinity, haue by their sorcerie and witchcraft wasted my body. And therewith he plucked vp his doublet sleeue to the elbow vpon his left arme, where he shewed a weariish withered arme, and small, as it was neuer other.

The Queene accused of Sorcery.

(44) And thereupon euery mans mind sore misgaue them, well perceiuing that this matter was but a quarrell: For they well knew, that the Queene was too wise to goe about any such folly; and if she would, yet would she of all others, not make Shores wife of counsell, whom of all Women shee most hated, as that Concubine whom the King her Husband had most loued. And also no man there present, but knew well enough, that his arme was euer such since his birth. Neuertheless the Lord Chamberlaine, (which from the death of King Edward kept Shores Wife, on whom he somewhat doated in the Kings life, sauing as it is said, that he forbare her for reuerence towards the King, or else of of a certain kind of fidelity to his friend) answered and said: Certainly my Lord, if they haue so hainously done, they be worthy of hainous punishment. What? (quoth the Protector) thou seruest mee I ween with ifs and with ands: I tell thee they haue so done, and that I will make good on thy body, Traitor. And therewith as in a great anger, he clapped his fist vpon the boord a great rap: at which token giuen, one without the Chamber cryed, Treason, wherewith a doore clapped, and in came rushing men in harnesse, as many as the Chamber might hold, and anon the Protector said to the Lord Hastings, I arrest thee Traitor: What, mee my Lord, quoth he? yea thee Traitor, quoth the Protector; and another let flie at the Lord Stanley, who shrunke at the stroke vnder the Table, or else his head had beene cleft to the teeth: for as swiftly as hee shrunke, yet came the blood about his eares. Then were they all quickly bestowed in diuers chambers, excepting onely the Lord Chamberlaine, whom the Protector bade speede and shriue him apace, for by Saint Paul said he, I will not to dinner, till I see thy head off. It booted him not to aske why, but heauily tooke a Priest at aduenture, and made a short shrift, for a longer would not be suffered; the Protector made so much haste to dinner, which he might not goe to, till this was done, for sauing of his oath. So was hee brought forth vnto the Greene, before the Chappell within the Tower, and his head laid downe vpon a long logge of timber, and there struck off, and afterward his body with the head, was enterred at Windsor, beside the body of King Edward.

The Lord Chamberlaine arrested.

The Lord Stanley wounded at the Councell-Table.

The Lord Chamberlaine beheaded.

(45) A maruailous case it is to heare, either of the warnings that hee should haue voyded, or the tokens of that hee could not auoid: for the selfe-night before his death, the Lord Stanley sent a trusty secret Messenger vnto him at Midnight in all the haste, requiring him to rise, and ride away with him, for he was vtterly disposed no longer to abide, he had so fearefull a dreame: in which he thought, that a Bore with his tuskes so razed them both by the heads, that the blood ranne about both their shoulders. And forasmuch as the Protector gaue the Bore for his cognizance, this dreame made so fearefull an impression in his heart, that hee was throughly determined no longer to tarry, but had his Horse ready, if the Lord Hastings would go with him, to ride yet so farre the same night, that they would be out of danger before it was day. Ah good Lord (quoth the Lord Hastings to the Messenger) leaneth my Lord thy Master so much to such trifles, and hath faith in dreames, which either his owne feare fantasieth, or doe rise in the nights rest, by reason of the dayes thoughts? Tell him it is plaine Witchcraft, to beleeue in such dreams, which if they were tokens of things to come, why thinketh he not, that wee might bee as likely to make them true by our going, if we were caught and brought backe (as friends faile flyers) for then had the Bore a cause likely to raze vs with his tuskes, as men that fled for some falshood: wherefore, either there is no perill, nor none there is indeed, or if any be, it is rather in going then abiding: And if we must needs fall in perill one way or other, yet had I rather that men should see, it were by other mens falshood, then thinke it our fault or faint heart. And therefore go to thy Master, man, and commend mee to him; and pray him to be merry, and haue no feare; for I assure him, I am as sure of the man that he wotteth of, as I am of mine own hand. God send Grace, Sir, (said the Messenger) and went his way.

The Lord Hastings answer to the Lord Stanleys message.

(46) Certaine it is also, that in riding towards the Tower the same morning in which hee was beheaded, his Horse twice or thrice stumbled with him, almost to the falling; which thing, albeit each man knoweth daily hapneth to them to whom no such mischance is toward, yet hath it beene of an old rite and custome obserued, as a token oftentimes, notably fore-going some great mis-fortune: Now this that followeth was no warning, but an enuious scorne. The same morning before hee was vp, came a Knight vnto him, as it were of courtesie, to accõpany him to the Councell; but of truth sent by the Protector, to haste him thither-wards, with whom hee was of secret confederacy in that purpose, a meane man at that time, but now of great authoritie. This Knight, when it happened the Lord Chamberlaine by the way to stay his horse, and commune a while with a Priest whom hee met in Tower-street, brake his tale, & said merrily to him; What, my Lord, I pray you come on, whereto talke you so long with a Priest? you haue no need of a Priest yet, and therewith laughed vpon vpon him, as though hee would ſay, Yee ſhall haue ſoone. But ſo little wiſt the other what he meant, and ſo little miſtruſted his preſent perill, as he neuer was merrier, nor neuer ſo full of good hope in his life, which ſelfe thing is often ſeene a ſigne of change; but I ſhall rather let any thing paſſe me, then the vaine ſurety of mans minde ſo neere his death. Vpon the very Tower-wharfe, ſo neere the place where his head was ſtrooke off ſoone after, there met he with one Haſtings, a Purſeuant of his owne name: And of their meeting in that place, hee was put in remembrance of another time, in which it had happened them before, to meet in the like manner together in the ſame place. At which other time the Lord Chamberlaine had beene accuſed vnto King Edward by the Lord Riuers the Queenes Brother, in ſuch wiſe as hee was for the while, (but it laſted not long) farre fallen into the Kings indignation, and ſtood in great feare of himſelfe. And foraſmuch as he now mette this Purſeuant in the ſame place, that ieopardy ſo well paſſed, it gaue him great pleaſure to talke with him thereof; with whom hee had before talked thereof in the ſame place, while he was therein. And therefore he ſaid, Ah Haſtings, art thou remembred that I met thee once here with a heauy heart? Yea, my Lord (quoth hee) that remember I well, and thanked be God, they got no good, nor you no great harme. Thou wouldeſt ſay ſo (quoth hee) if thou knew ſo much as I know, which few know elſe as yet, and more ſhall ſhortly. That meant hee by the Lords of the Queenes kindred, which were taken before, and ſhould that ſame day bee beheaded at Pomfret: which he well wiſt, but was nothing aware, that the axe hung ouer his owne head. In faith man (quoth he) I was neuer ſo ſorry, nor neuer ſtood in ſo great dread of my life, as I did when thou and I met here; And loe, how the world is changed, now ſtand my enemies in the danger (as thou maiſt hap to heare more hereafter) and I neuer in my life ſo merry, nor neuer in ſo great ſurety. Oh good God, the blindneſſe of our mortall nature! when he moſt feared, he was in good ſurety, when he reckoned himſelfe ſureſt, he loſt his life, and that within two houres after. Thus ended this honourable man, a good Knight and a gentle, of great authoritie with his Prince, of liuing ſomewhat diſſolute, plaine and open to his enemies, and ſecret to his friends, eaſie to be beguiled, as he that of good heart and courage fore-ſtudied no perils; a louing man, a paſſing well-beloued: very faithfull, and truſty enough, truſting indeed too much. Now flew the fame of this Lords death ſwiftly thorow the City, and from thence further, like a winde, in euery mans eare.

(47) But the Protector immediately after dinner, intending to ſet ſome colour vpon the matter, ſent in all haſte for many ſubſtantiall men, out of the City into the Tower, at whoſe comming thither, himſelfe with the Duke of Buckingham, ſtood harneſſed in olde ruſty briganders, ſuch as no more, man ſhould weene, that they would vouchſafe to haue put on their backes, except that ſome ſudden neceſſitie had conſtrained them thereto. And then the Protector ſhewed them, that the Lord Chamberlaine, and others of his conſpiracy, had contriued to haue ſuddenly deſtroyed him and the Duke there the ſame day in Councell. And what they intended further, was not yet well knowne. Of which their treaſon he neuer had knowledge, before ten of the clocke, the ſame fore-noone, which ſudden feare droue them to put on for their defence, ſuch harneſſe as came next to hand: and ſo had God holpen them, that the miſchiefe returned vpon them that would haue done it: and this hee required them to report.

The fained feare of the Lord Protector.

(48) Euery man anſwered him faire, as though no man miſtruſted the matter, which of truth no man beleeued; yet for the further appeaſing of the peoples minde, he ſent immediately after dinner, in all haſte, an Herald of Armes, with a Proclamation to be made thorow the City, in the Kings name, containing that the Lord Haſtings, with diuers others of his traiterous purpoſe, had before conſpired the ſame day, to haue ſlaine the Lord Protector, and Duke of Buckingham, ſitting in the Councell, and after to haue taken vpon them, to rule the King and the Realme, at their own pleaſures; thereby to pill and ſpoyle whom they liſted, vncontrolled. And much matter there was in that Proclamation, deuiſed to the ſlander of the Lord Chamberlaine, as that he was an euil Counceller to the Kings father, entiſing him to many things, highly redounding to his great diſhonour, and to the vniuerſall hurt of

of his Realme, by his euill company, ſiniſter procuring, and vngracious example, aſwell in many other things, as in the vicious liuing, and inordinate abuſion of his body, both with many others, and eſpecially with Shores Wife, who was one alſo of his moſt ſecret Counſell, in this hainous Treaſon, with whom hee lay nightly, and namely, the night laſt paſt before his death, ſo that it was the leſſe maruell, if vngracious liuing brought him to an vnhappy ending, which he was now put vnto, by the moſt dread commandement of the Kings Highneſſe, and of his honourable and faithfull Counſell, both for his demerits, being ſo openly taken in his falſely conceiued treaſon, as alſo leſt the delaying of his execution, might haue encouraged other miſchieuous perſons, partners of his conſpiracie, to gather and aſſemble themſelues together in making ſome great commotion for his deliuerance, whoſe hope being now by his well-deſerued death politickly repreſſed, all the Realme ſhould by Gods Grace, reſt in good quiet and peace.

The Protectors ſubtilty further knowne by his Proclamation.

(49) Now was this Proclamation made within two houres, after that hee was beheaded, & was ſo curiouſly indited, and ſo faire written in Parchment, in ſo well a ſet hand, and therewith of it ſelfe ſo long a proceſſe, as euery childe might perceiue, that it was prepared before. For all the time between his death, and the proclaiming, could ſcant haue ſufficed vnto the bare writing alone; had it beene but in paper, and ſcribbled forth in haſte at aduenture. So that vpon the proclaiming thereof, one that was Schoole-maſter of Pauls, of chance ſtanding by, and comparing the ſhortneſſe of the time, with the length of the matter, ſaid vnto them that ſtood about him; Here is a gay goodly caſt, foule caſt away for haſte: and a Merchant anſwered him, that it was written by Propheſie. Now then by and by, as it were for anger, not for couetouſneſſe, the Protector ſent the Sheriffes of London, into the houſe of Shores Wife (for her Husband dwelled not with her) and ſpoyled her of all that ſhee had, aboue the value of three thouſand markes, carrying her thorow London vnto the Tower, and there left her Priſoner, where (for faſhion ſake) he laid to her charge, that ſhee went about to bewitch him, and that ſhee was of Counſell with the Lord Chamberlaine to deſtroy him: In concluſion, when no colour could faſten vpon theſe matters, then laid he hainouſly vnto her charge, the thing that her ſelf could not deny, that all the World wiſt was true, and that neithleſſe euery man laughed at, to heare it then ſo ſuddenly, ſo highly taken, that ſhe was naught of her body. And for that cauſe (as a good continent Prince, cleare and faultleſſe himſelfe, ſent out of Heauen into this vicious World for the amendment of mens manners) after ſhee had laine priſoner in Ludgate, hee cauſed the Biſhop of London to put her to open penance, going before the Croſſe in proceſſion vpon a Sunday, with a Taper in her hand. In which ſhee went in countenance and pace demure, ſo womanly, and albeit ſhee were out of all array ſaue her Kirtle onely, yet went ſhee ſo faire and louely, namely, while the wondering of the people caſt a comely rud in her cheekes (of which before ſhee had moſt miſt) that her great ſhame wanne her much praiſe, among thoſe that were more amorous of her body, then curious of her ſoule. And many good folke alſo that hated her liuing, and glad to ſee ſinne ſo corrected, yet pittied the more her penance, then rejoyced therein, when they conſidered that the Protector procured it more of a corrupt intent, then any vertuous affection.

The Schoole-maſters opinion.

The deſcription of Iane Shore.

(50) This Woman was borne in London, worſhipfully friended, honeſtly brought vp, and very well married, ſauing ſomewhat too ſoone; her Husband an honeſt Citizen, young, and goodly, and of good ſubſtance. But for as much as they were coupled ere ſhee were well ripe, ſhee not very feruently loued, for whom ſhee neuer longed; which was haply the thing that the more made her incline vnto the Kings appetite, when he required her. Howbeit the reſpect of his Royalty, the hope of gay apparell, eaſe, pleaſure, and other wanton wealth, was able ſoone to pierce a ſoft tender heart. But when the King had abuſed her, anon her Husband (as he was an honeſt man, and one that could his good, not preſuming to touch a kings Cocubine) left her vp to him altogether. When the King dyed, the Lord Chamberlaine tooke her, which in the Kings daies, albeit he was ſore enamoured vpon her, yet he forbare her, either for reuerence, or for a certaine friendly faithfulnes: proper ſhe was, and faire; nothing in her body that you could haue changed; ged; vnleſſe you would haue wiſhed her ſomewhat higher. Thus they ſay that knew her in her youth. Albeit ſome that now ſee her (for as yet ſhe liueth) deeme her neuer to haue beene well viſaged, whoſe judgement ſeemeth to mee ſomewhat like, as though we could geſſe the beauty of one long before departed, by her ſcalpe taken out of the Charnell-houſe: for now ſhe is old, leane, withered, and dried vp, nothing left but riueled skinne, and hard bone; and yet being euen ſuch, who ſo well aduiſe her viſage, might geſſe and deuiſe, which parts how filled, would make it a faire face. Yet delighted not men, ſo much in her beauty, as in her pleaſant behauiour, for a proper wit ſhe had, and could both reade well and write, merry in company, ready and quicke of anſwer, neither mute nor full of babble, ſometime taunting without diſpleaſure, and not without diſport: in whom King Edward tooke ſpeciall pleaſure, whoſe fauour to ſay the truth (for ſin it were to belie the Diuell) ſhe neuer abuſed to any mans hurt, but to many a mans comfort and reliefe; when the King tooke diſpleaſure, ſhee would mitigate and appeaſe his minde; where men were out of fauour, ſhee would bring them in his grace, for many that highly offended, ſhee obtained pardon. Of great forfeitures ſhe gat them remiſſion. And finally, in many weighty ſuites ſhe ſtood many men in great ſtead, either for none, or very ſmall rewards, and thoſe rather gay then rich, either for that ſhe was content with the deed it ſelfe well done, or for that ſhee delighted to be ſued vnto, and to ſhew what ſhee was able to doe with the King, or, for that wanton women and wealthy be not alwaies couetous. I doubt not, ſome ſhall thinke this Woman too ſlight a thing to bee written of, and ſet among the remembrances of great matters: which they ſhall ſpecially thinke, that haply ſhall eſteeme her onely by that they now ſee her. But to my ſeeming, the chance is ſo much the more worthy to be remembred, in how much ſhee is now in the more beggerly condition, vnfriended, and worne out of acquaintance, after good ſubſtance, after ſo great fauour with a Prince, after ſo great ſuite and ſeeking to, of all thoſe, that in thoſe dayes had buſineſſe to ſpeede, as many other men were in their times, which be now famous onely by the infamy of their ill deeds: her doings were not much leſſe, albeit they bee much leſſe remembred, becauſe they were not ſo euill: for men vſe, if they receiue an euill turne, to write it in Marble: and whoſo doth vs a good turne, we write it in the duſt; which is not worſt proued by her: for at this day ſhe beggeth of many, at this day liuing, that at this day had begged if ſhe had not beene.

She died the eighteenth yeer of King Henry the eight, ſaith Iohn Harding.

Shores wife did much good, but no man hurt.

The Subject not vnworthy to be written.

(51) Now it was ſo deuiſed by the Protector and his Councell, that the ſelfe-ſame day in which the L. Chamberlaine was beheaded in the Tower of London, and about the ſelfe-ſame houre, was then (not without his aſſent) beheaded at Pomfret, the fore-remembred Lords and Knights, that were taken from the King at Northampton, and Stony-Stratford, which thing was done in the preſence, and by the order of Sir Richard Ratcliffe Knight, whoſe ſeruice the Protector ſpecially vſed in that counſel, and in the execution of ſuch lawleſſe enterpriſes, as a man that had beene long ſecret with him, hauing experience of the World, and a ſhrewd wit, ſhort and rude in ſpeech, rough and boiſterous of behauiour, bold in miſchiefe, as farre from pitty, as from all feare of God. This Knight bringing them out of priſon to the Scaffold, and ſhewing to the people preſent, that they were Traitors, not ſuffering them to ſpeake, or declare their innocency, leſt their words might haue inclined men to pitty them, and to hate the Protector and his part; cauſed them haſtily, without Iudgement, proceſſe, or manner of order, to be beheaded, and without all guilt, but onely that they were good men, too true to the King, and too nigh to the Queene.

The Lords of the Queenes blood beheaded at Pomfret.

(52) Now when the Lord Chamberlaine, and thoſe other Lords and Knights were thus beheaded and ridde out of the way: then thought the Protector, that while men muſed what the matter meant, while the Lords of the Realme were about him out of their owne ſtrengths, while no man wiſt what to thinke, nor whom to truſt, before they ſhould haue ſpace to diſpute, and digeſt the matter, and make parties, it were beſt haſtily to purſue his purpoſe, and put himſelfe in poſſeſſion of the Crown, ere men could haue time to deuiſe how to reſiſt. But now was all the ſtudy, by what meanes the matter, being of it ſelfe ſo hainous, might bee firſt broken to the people in ſuch wiſe as

as it might be well taken. To this counsell they tooke diuers, such as they thought meete to be trusted, likely to be induced to that part, and able to stand them in stead, either by power or policy: Among whom they made of counsell Edmund Shaa Knight, then Major of London, who vpon trust of his owne aduancement, wherof he was of a proud heart, highly desirous, should frame the Citie to their appetite. Of Spirituall men they tooke such as had wit, and were in authority among the people, for opinion of their learning, and had no scrupulous conscience. Among these had they Iohn Shaa Clerke, brother to the Major, and Fryer Pinker, Prouinciall of the Augustine Friers, both of them Doctors in Diuinity, both great Preachers, both of more learning then vertue, and of more fame then learning: for they were before greatly esteemed of the common people; but after that, neuer. Of these two, the one made a Sermon in praise of the Protector before the Coronation; the other after, both so full of tedious flattery, as no mans eare could abide them.

The Major of London made of the Protectors counsell.

Shaa and Pinker two flattering Preachers.

(53) Pinker in his Sermon so lost his voyce, that he was forced to leaue off, and came downe in the middest. Doctor Shaa by his Sermon lost his honesty, and soone after his life, for very shame of the world, into which he durst neuer after come abroad. But the Fryer forced for no shame, and so it harmed him the lesse. Howbeit some doubt, and many thinke, that Pinker was not of counsell in the matter before the Coronation, but after the common manner, fell to flattery after: namely, sith his Sermon was not incontinent vpon it, but at Saint Maries Hospitall in the Easter weeke following. But certaine it is, that Doctor Shaa was of counsell in the beginning, so farre forth as they determined that he should first breake the matter in a Sermon at Pauls-Crosse, in which he should by the authority of his preaching, incline the people to the Protectors ghostly purpose. But now was all the labour and study, in the deuice of some conuenient pretext; for which the people would be content to depose the Prince, and accept the Protector for King. In which diuers things they deuised: but the chiefe thing and the weightiest of all, the inuention rested in this, that they should alleadge bastardy, either in King Edward himselfe, or in his Children, or both. So that hee should seeme disabled to inherite the Crowne, by the Duke of Yorke, and the Prince by him. To lay bastardy in King Edward, sounded openly to the rebuke of the Protectors owne Mother, who was Mother to them both: for in that point could be none other colour, but to pretend that his owne Mother was an adultéresse, which notwithstanding to further the purpose he letted not: but yet he would that point should be lesse, and more fauourably handled, not fully plaine and directly, but that the matter should be touched aslope, and craftily, as though men spared in that poynt to speake all the truth for feare of his displeasure. But the other point, concerning the bastardie that they deuised to surmise in King Edwards Children, that would he should be openly declared, and enforced to the vttermost. The colour and pretext whereof, was a contract pretended to be made by King Edward vnto the Lady Lucy, whereof we haue spoken in the raigne of the said King: which inuention how simple soeuer, yet it liked them, to whom it sufficed to haue somewhat to say, while they were sure to be compelled to no larger proofe then themselues list to make.

Pinker preached at Saint Maries Hospitall, and Doctor Shaa at Pauls-Crosse.

The plot and deuice how to entitle the Protector to the Crowne.

The Sonne maketh the Mother an Adultéresse.

K. Edward and his children made bastards.

(54) Now then, it was by the Protector and his Councell concluded, that Doctor Shaa should signifie in his Sermon aforesaid, that neither King Edward himselfe, nor the Duke of Clarence were lawfully begot, nor were the very Children of the Duke of Yorke, but begot vnlawfully by other persons, by Adulterie of the Dutches their Mother. And also that Dame Elizabeth Lucy, was verily the Wife of King Edward, and so the Prince and all his other children, begot by the Queene, were all of them bastards. And according to this deuice, Doctor Shaa vpon Sun-day the nineteenth of Iune, at Pauls-Crosse, in a frequent assembly, tooke for the theame of his Sermon this saying, Spuria vitulamina non agent radices altas: Bastard slips shall neuer take deepe roote. Whereupon, when hee had shewed the great grace that God giueth, and secretly infundeth in right generation after the lawes of Matrimonie, then declared he, that commonly those children lacked that grace, and for the punishment of their parents, were for the more part vnhappy, which were begot in base, but specially in adultery. Of which though some ſome by the ignorance of the world, and the truth hid from knowledge, inherite for the time other mens lands, yet God alwaies ſo prouideth, that it continueth not in their blood long, but the truth comming to light, the rightfull inheritors be reſtored, and the baſtards ſlip pulled vp ere it can take any deepe root. And when hee had laid for the proofe and confirmation of this ſentence, certaine examples taken out of the Old Teſtament, and other ancient Hiſtories, then he began to deſcend into the praiſe of the Lord Richard, late Duke of Yorke, calling him the father to the Lord Protector, and declared the title of his heires vnto the Crowne, to whom it was after the death of King Henry the ſixt, entayled by authoritie of Parliament. Then ſhewed he, that the very right heire of his body lawfully begotten, was onely the Lord Protector. For hee declared then, that King Edward was, neuer lawfully married vnto the Queene, but was before God, Husband vnto Dame Elizabeth Lucy, and ſo his Children Baſtards. And beſides that, neither King Edward himſelfe, nor the Duke of Clarence, among thoſe that were ſecret in the Houſhold, were reckoned very certainly for the children of the noble Duke, as thoſe that by their features reſembled other knowne men more then him, from whoſe vertuous conditions, he ſaid alſo, that King Edward was far off. But the Lord Protector, he ſaid, the very Noble Prince, the ſpeciall patterne of Knightly proweſſe, as well in all Princely behauiour, as in the lineaments and fauour of his Viſage, repreſenting the very face of the Noble Duke his father: This is (quoth he) the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the very print of his viſage, the very vndoubted Image & plain expreſſe likeneſſe of that noble Duke.

Slaunderous ſhamefull aſſertions.

(55) Now it was before deuiſed, that in the ſpeaking of theſe words, the Protector ſhould haue come in among the people to the Sermon-ward, to the end that thoſe words meeting with his preſence, might haue been taken among the hearers, as though the holy Ghoſt had put them in the Preachers mouth, and ſhould haue mooued the people euen then to cry, King Richard, King Richard, that it might haue beene after ſaid, that he was ſpecially choſen by God, and in maner by miracle. But this deuice quailed, either by the Protectors negligence, or by the Preachers ouer-much diligẽce; for while the Protector was found by the way tarrying, leſt he ſhould preuent thoſe words, and the Doctor fearing leſt he ſhould come ere his Sermon could come to theſe words, haſted his matter thereto, who was come to them and paſt them, and had entred into other matter ere the Protector came. Whom when he beheld comming, hee ſuddenly left the matter with which he was in hand, and without any deduction thereunto, out of all order, and out of all frame, began to repeat thoſe words again: This is the very Noble Prince, the ſpeciall patterne of Knightly proweſſe, which as well in all Princely behauiour, as in the lineaments and fauour of his viſage, repreſenteth the very face of the Noble Duke of Yorke his father: this is the Fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the very print of his Viſage, the ſure vndoubted Image, the plaine expreſſe likeneſſe of the Noble Duke, whoſe remembrance can neuer die while he liueth. While theſe words were in ſpeaking, the Protector, accompanied with the Duke of Buckingham, went thorow the people, into the place where the Doctors commonly ſtand in an vpper Storie, where he ſtood to heare the Sermon. But the people were ſo farre from crying King Richard, that they ſtood as if they had beene turned into ſtones, for wonder of this ſhamefull Sermon. After which once ended, the Preacher got him home, and neuer after durſt looke out for ſhame, but kept himſelfe out of ſight like an Owle. And when he once asked one, that had beene his old friend, what the people talked of him, albeit that his owne conſcience well ſhewed him that they talked no good, yet when the other anſwered him, that there was in euery mans mouth ſpoken of him much ſhame, it ſo ſtrucke him to the heart, that within few dayes after, he withered and conſumed away.

Gods heauy puniſhment vpon the falſe flattering Preacher.

(56) On the Tueſday following this Sermon, there came into the Guild-Hall in London the Duke of Buckingham, accompanied with diuers Lords and Knights, more perchance then knew the meſſage which they brought. And there in the Eaſt end of the Hall, where the Major keepeth the Huſtings, the Major, and Aldermen being aſſembled about him, and all the Commons of the Citie gathered before him: after ſilence commanded in the Protectors name vpon great paine, the Duke ſtood vp, and (as he was neither vnlearned, and of nature maruellouſly well ſpoken) he ſaid vnto the people with a cleare and loud voyce in this manner: Friends, for the zeale and heartie fauour that we beare you, wee be come to breake vnto you, a matter of great weight, and no leſſe weighty, thē pleaſing to God, and profitable to all the Realme: nor to no part of the Realme more profitable then to you the Citizens of this noble Citie. For why, the thing that we wot well you haue long time lacked, and ſo longed for, that you would haue giuen great good for, that you would haue gone farre to fetch, that thing wee be come hither to bring you, without your labour, paine, coſt, aduenture, or jeopardy. What thing is that? Certes, the ſurety of your owne bodies, the quiet of your wiues, and your daughters, the ſafe-guard of your goods: of all which things in times paſt you ſtood euermore in doubt. For who was there of you all, that could account himſelfe Lord of his owne goods, among ſo many ſnares and traps as were ſet therefore, among ſo much pilling and polling, among ſo many taxes & tallages, of which there was neuer end, and oftentimes no need: or if any were, it rather grew of ryot, and vnreaſonable waſte, then any neceſſary or honourable charge? So that there was daily pilling from good men and honeſt, great ſubſtance of goods to be laſhed out among vnthrifts, ſo farre forth that fifteenes ſufficed not, nor any vſuall manner of knowne taxes: but vnder an eaſie name of beneuolence and good will, the Commiſſioners ſo much of euery man tooke, as no man could with his good will haue giuen. As though that name of beneuolence, had ſignified that euery man ſhould pay not what himſelfe of his owne good will liſt to grant, but what the King of his good will liſt to take: who neuer asked little, but euery thing was haunſed aboue the meaſure, amercements turned into fines, fines into ranſomes; ſmall treſpaſſes into miſpriſion, miſpriſion into treaſon. Whereof I thinke no man looketh that wee ſhould remember you of examples by name, as though Burdet were forgotten, who was for a word in haſte ſpoken, cruelly beheaded, by the miſconſtruing of the Lawes of this Realme for the Princes pleaſure: with no leſſe honour to Markham then chiefe Iuſtice, that left his office rather then hee would aſſent to that judgement, then to the diſhoneſty of thoſe, that either for feare or flattery gaue that judgement. What? Cooke your owne worſhipfull neighbour, Alderman and Major of this noble Citie; who is of you either ſo negligent that hee knoweth not, or ſo forgetfull that he remembreth not, or ſo hard-hearted that hee pittieth not that worſhipfull mans loſſe? What ſpeake we of loſſe? His vtter ſpoile and vndeſerued deſtruction, onely for that it happened thoſe to fauour him whom the Prince fauoured not. Wee need not (I ſuppoſe) to rehearſe of theſe any moe by name, ſith there be (I doubt not) many heere preſent, that either in themſelues, or in their nigh friends, haue knowne aſwell their goods, as their perſons greatly indangered, either by fained quarrels, or ſmall matters agrieued with hainous names. And alſo there was no crime ſo great, of which there could lacke a pretext. For ſith the King preuenting the time of his inheritance, attained the Crowne by battell; it ſufficed in a rich man for a pretext of treaſon, to haue beene of kindred or aliance, neere familiarity, or longer acquaintance, with any of thoſe that were at any time the Kings enemies, which was at one time or other, more then halfe the Realme. Thus were your goods neuer in ſurety, and yet they brought your bodies in ieopardie, beſide the common aduenture of open warre, which albeit, that it is euer the will and occaſion of much miſchiefe, yet it is neuer ſo miſchieuous, as where any people fall at diſtance among thē-ſelues, nor in no earthly Nation ſo deadly and ſo peſtilent, as when it happeneth among vs: and among vs neuer ſo long continued diſſention, nor ſo many battels in that ſeaſon, nor ſo cruell and ſo deadly fought, as was in that Kings dayes that dead is, God forgiue it his ſoule. In whoſe time, and by whoſe occaſion, what about the getting of the Garland, keeping it, loſing it, and winning it againe, it hath coſt more Engliſh blood, then hath twice the winning of France: In which ward warre among our ſelues, hath beene ſo great effuſion of the ancient noble

The Dukes pithy perswasions vnto the Citizens.

(57) When the Duke had said, and looked that the people, whom hee hoped the Major had framed before, should after this proposition made, haue cryed, King Richard, King Richard; all was husht and mute, and not a word answered thereunto: wherewith the Duke was maruailously abashed, and taking the Major neerer to him, with other that were about him priuie to that matter, said vnto him softly, What meaneth this, that the people be so silent? Sir (quoth the Major) perchance they perceiue you not well. That shall we mend (quoth hee) if that will helpe. And by and by somewhat lowder, he rehearsed them the same matter againe, in other order, and other words, so well and ornately, so euidently and plaine, with voyce, gesture, and countenance so comely, that euery man much maruailed that heard him, and thought they neuer had in their hearing, so euill a tale so wel told. But were it for wonder or feare, or that each man lookt that other speake first; not a word was there answered of all the people that stood before, but was as still as the midnight, not so much as rowning among themselues, by which they might seeme to commune what was best to doe. When the Lord Major saw this, hee, with the other partners of that counsell drew about the Duke, and said, That the people had not beene accustomed there to be spoken vnto, but by the Recorder; who is the mouth of the Citie, and happely to him they will answer.

The Recorder commanded to speake to the people.

swer. With that, the Recorder, called Fitz-William, a sad man and an honest, who was so newly come into that office, that he neuer had spoken to the people before, and loth was with that matter to begin; notwithstanding, thereunto commanded by the Major, he made rehearsall to the Commons, of that the Duke had twice rehearsed to them himselfe. But the Recorder so tempered his tale, that hee shewed euery thing as the Dukes words, and no part of his owne. But all this noting, no change made in the people, which stood gazing at the Bench as men altogether amazed. Whereupon the Duke rowned vnto the Major, and said, This is maruellous obstinate silence: and therewith he turned vnto the people againe with these words: Deare friends, we come to moue you to that thing which peraduenture wee not so greatly needed, but that the Lords of this Realme, and the Commons of other parts might haue sufficed, sauing that we beare you such loue, and so much set by your friendship, that we would not willingly doe without you the thing which is for our honour and your wealth, which, as it seemeth, either you see not, or weigh not; wherefore we require you, giue vs answer, whether yee be minded as all the Nobles of the Realme be, to haue this noble Prince now Protector, to be your King or not.

The great silence of the people.

The Duke speaketh once more.

(58) At which words the people began to whisper among themselues secretly, that the voyce was neither loud nor distinct, but as it were the sound of a swarme of Bees, till at the last, in the nether end of the Hall, a bushment of the Dukes seruants, and Nash-fields, and of others belonging to the Protector, with some Prentices and Lads that thrust into the Hall among the presse, began suddenly at mens backes to cry out as loud as their throats would giue, King Richard, King Richard, and threw vp their caps in token of joy. But they that stood before, cast backe their heads, maruelling thereat, yet nothing they said. And when the Duke and Major saw this manner, they wisely turne it to their purpose, and said it was a goodly cry, and joyfull, to heare euery man with one voyce, no man saying nay: wherefore friends (quoth the Duke) since that we well perceiue that it is all your whole minds to haue this Nobleman for your King, whereof wee shall make to his Grace so effectuall report, that wee doubt not but it shall redound vnto your great wealth, and commoditie: wee require that to morrow you goe with vs, and wee with you vnto his noble Grace, to make our humble request vnto him in manner before remembred. And therewith the Lords came downe, and the assembly dissolued, for the most part sad, some with glad semblances, and yet not very merry, yea, and some that came with the Duke, not able to dissemble their sorrow, were faine at his backe to turne their face to the wall, while the dolour of their heart burst out of their eyes.

(59) On the next morrow, the Major with all the Aldermen, and chiefe Commoners of the Citie in their best array, assembling themselues together, resorted vnto Baynards Castle in Thames streete, where the Protector lay. To which place repaired also according to their appointment, the Duke of Buckingham, with diuers Noblemen with him, besides many Knights and other Gentlemen. And thereupon the Duke sent word vnto the Lord Protector, of the being there of a great and honourable company, to moue a great matter vnto his Grace: whereupon the Protector made difficultie to come out vnto them, but if hee first knew some part of their errand, as though hee doubted, and partly distrusted the comming of such a number vnto him so suddenly, without any warning, or knowledge whether they came for good or harme; then the Duke when hee had shewed this vnto the Maior and other, that they might thereby see, how little the Protector looked for this matter; they then sent vnto him by the Messenger such louing message againe, and therewith so humbly besought him to vouchsafe, that they might resort to his presence, to propose their intent, which they would not impart to any other person; that at the last hee came out of his chamber, and yet not downe vnto them, but stood aboue in a gallery ouer them, where they might see him and speake to him, as though hee would not yet come too neere them, till he vnderstood what they meant. And thereupon the Duke of Buckingham first made humble petition vnto him on the behalfe of them all, that his Grace would pardon them, and licence them to propose vnto his Grace, the intent of their comming without his displeasure, without which pardon obtained, they durst not be so bold to mooue him in their suite. In which albeit they meant as much honour to his Grace, as wealth to all the Realme beside; yet were they not sure how his Grace would take it, whom they would in no wise offend. Then the Protector (as he was very gentle of himselfe, and also longed sore to know what they meant) gaue him leaue to propose what him liked, verily trusting for the good minde that he bare them all, none of them would intend any thing to himward, wherwith he ought to be grieued.

(60) When the Duke had this leaue and pardon to speake, then waxed hee bold to shew him their intent and purpose, with all the causes moouing them thereunto, as you haue heard before: and finally, to beseech his Grace, that it would like him of his accustomed goodnesse and zeale vnto the Realme, now with his eye of pitty, to behold the long-continued distresse, and decay of the same, and to set his gracious hands to redresse an amendement thereof, by taking vpon him the Crowne and gouernment of the Land; according to his right and title lawfully descended vnto him, and to the Law of God, profit of the Realm, and vnto his Grace so much the more honour, and lesse paine, in that, that neuer Prince raigned ouer any people that were so glad to liue vnder his obeisance, as the people of this Land vnder his.

The Protector intreated to accept of the Crowne.

(61) When the Protector had heard the proposition, he looked very strangely thereat, and answered: That albeit it were, hee partly knew the things by them alledged to be true, yet such intire loue he bare vnto King Edward and his children, that so much more he regarded his honour in other Realmes about, then the Crowne of any one, of which he was neuer desirous, that he could not finde in his heart in this point to incline to their desire. For in all other Nations where the truth was not well knowne, it would peraduenture be thought, that it was his owne ambitious minde and deuice to depose the Prince, and to take himselfe the Crowne, with which infamie hee would not haue his honour stained for any Crowne, in which hee had euer perceiued much more labour and paine, then pleasure to him that would so vse it, as hee that would not, were not worthy to haue it. Notwithstanding hee not onely pardoned them the motion that they made him, but also thanked them for the loue and hearty fauour they bare him, praying them for his sake to giue and beare the same to the Prince, vnder whom hee was, and would be content to liue, and with his labour and counsell, as farre as should like the King to vse him, hee would doe his vttermost endeauour to set the Realme in good state, which was already in this little time of his Protectorship (the praise be giuen to God) well begun, in that the malice of such as were before, occasion of the contrary, and of new intended to be, were now partly by good policy, partly more by Gods speciall prouidence, then mans prouision, repressed.

The Protector saith nay, and would haue it.

(62) Vpon this answer giuen, the Duke by the Protectors licence, a little rowned, aswell with other Noblemen about him, as with the Major and Recorder of London. And after that, vpon like pardon desired and obtained, hee shewed aloud vnto the Protector for a finall conclusion, that the Realme was at a point, King Edwards line should not any longer raigne ouer them, both for that they had so farre gone, as it was now no suretie to retreat, as for that they thought it was for the weale vniuersall to take that way, although they had not yet begun it. Wherefore, if it would like his Grace to take the Crown vpon him, they would humbly beseech him thereunto; if he would giue them a resolute answer to the contrary, which they would be loth to heare, then must they needs seeke, and would not faile to finde some other Noble-man that would. These words much mooued the Protector, which else as euery man may know, would neuer of likelyhood haue inclined thereunto. But when hee saw there was none other way, but that either he must take it, or else he, and his both goe from it, he said vnto the Lords and Commons:

Buckingham vrgeth and threatneth the refusall,

(63) Sith wee well perceiue that all the Realme is so set, whereof we be very sorry, that they will not suffer in any wise King Edwards line to gouerne them, whom no earthly man can gouerne against their wils, and well wee also perceiue, that no man there is to whom the Crowne can by just title appertaine, as to our selfe, as very right heire lawfully begotten of the body of our most deare Father Richard late Duke of Yorke, to which title is now joyned your your election, the Nobles and Commons of this Realme, which we of all title possible take for the most effectuall: we be content, and agree fauourably to incline to your petition and request, and according to the same, we here take vpon vs the Royall estate, preeminence, and kingdom of the two noble Realmes, England and France, the one from this day forward, by vs and our heires, to rule, gouerne, and defend; the other by Gods Grace, and your good helpe, to get againe, and subdue, and establish for euer in due obedience vnto this Realme of England, the aduancement whereof we neuer aske of God longer to liue, then we intend to procure. With this there was a great shout, crying King Richard, King Richard. And then the Lords went vp to the King (for so was hee from that time called) and the people departed, talking diuersly of the matter, euery man as his fantasie gaue him.

Diuers opinions of the people.

(64) Much was talked and maruelled at the manner of this dealing, that the matter was made so strange vnto both parties, as though they neuer had communed either with others before, when as themselues wist there was no man so dull that heard them, but perceiued well inough, that all the matter was so made betweene them. Howbeit, some excused that againe, and said all must be done in good order: And men must sometimes for manners sake, not be acknowne what they know: for at the consecration of a Bishop, euery man wotteth well, by the paying for his Bulles, that he purposeth to be one, and though he pay for nothing else, and yet must hee twice bee asked, whether hee will bee a Bishop or no, and hee must twice say nay, and at the third time take it, as compelled thereunto by his owne will. And in a Stage-play, the people know right well, that he who playeth the Sowdaine, is percase a Sowter, yet if one should know so little good, to shew out of season what acquaintance hee hath with him, and call him by his owne name while hee standeth in his Majestie, one of his tormentors might hap to breake his head worthily for marring of the play.

The Raigne and age of King Edward.

(65) The Raigne of this young King may well be accounted an inter-regnum, without King, aswell for his minoritie, beeing vnder the rule of a Protector himselfe, as for the short time wherein he continued the name of a King, which onely was two moneths and sixteene daies, and in them also he sate vncrowned, without Scepter or Ball, all which Richard aimed at, and perfidiously got, before they could come to his head; or into his hands. His age at the death of his Father, and entrance into his Throane, was eleuen yeeres, fiue moneths, and fiue daies, and within three moneths after was with his Brother smothered to death in the Tower of London, as shall bee shewed in his Raigne, of whom we are now by order of succession to write.

Richard III.

RICHARD THE THIRD, KING OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE, AND LORD OF IRELAND, THE FIFTIE SIXTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH, HIS RAIGNE, ACTES, ISSVE, AND DEATH.

Monarch 56

For the most part written by Sir Thomas Moore.

Chapter XIX.

Richard, the third Son of Richard Duke of Yorke, borne at Fotheringhay Castle in the County of Northhampton, was first honoured with the title of Glouceſter, being the third Duke of that number, and consequently by vſurpation crowned King of England, the third of that name. A name indeed noted to the Kings ſo called, to be euer ominous; and the title of Glouceſter to thoſe Dukes euer fatall, all of both, dying violent and vntimely deaths, deaths, which ought to haue beene the more fearefull vnto Richard, now hauing poſſeſſion and intereſt in them both. But that not regarded, or deſtiny enforcing, his aſpiring minde gaue him no reſt, till his reſtleſſe body found it laſtly in the graue. For his brother deceaſed when his life was moſt deſired, no man in ſhew tooke his death ſo heauily as himſelfe, or tendered the young King with a more honourable reſpect, when as (God knowes) his minde ranne vpon deepe reaches, how to compaſſe the Wreath for his owne head; which the better to faſhion, hee withdrew a while into the North, and at Yorke in moſt ſad and ſolemne manner obſerued the Funerals of the dead King: but howſoeuer the Maske couered this ſubtle Dukes face from the eye of the multitude; yet Buckingham well knew the ambitious deſire of his aſpiring heart, and indeed was the Dedalus that made him the wings, wherewith he mounted ſo neere vnto the Sunne, as that the waxe melting (like the high-minded young Icarus) hee caught his laſt fall.

All the Richards and Dukes of Glouceſter came to vntimely deaths.

Richard 1. ſlaine with an arrow. Richard 2. murthered at Pomfret. Tho. Woodſtocke ſmothered to death. Humfrey murthered at Saint Edmundsbury. Richard 3. ſlaine at Boſworth field.

The Duke of Buckingham the onely raiſer of the Protector.

(2) What intendments they had before the Kings death, is vncertaine, though it may be ſuſpected: but ſure it is, hee now gone, the Duke of Buckingham twice ſollicited Glouceſter by his meſſengers in the North, met him at Northampton himſelf, accompanied him to London, forwarded him in counſell, and was the firſt actor in this following tragedie. For, firſt making him Protector, procuring his young Nephew forth of Sanctuary, diſabling the young King, baſtardizing them both, perſwading the Citizens, working the Nobilitie: and all this done, to ſet the Crowne vpon crookt Richards head, and ſo moulded their mindes vnto the man, as they all became humble petitioners vnto him for to accept of the ſame, who in the meane-while had well conned his owne part, by profuſe liberalitie, by paſſing-great grauitie, by ſingular affabilitie, by miniſtring of juſtice, and by deepe and cloſe deuices, whereby hee wonne to himſelfe the hearts of all, but the Lawyers eſpecially, to ſerue beſt his turne, which was ſo affected, that in the name of all the States of the Realme, a Petition was drawne and preſented him to accept the wearing of the Crowne: the true Copy whereof as we finde it recorded in the Parliament Roll, wee haue inſerted, and is as followeth:

A Petition exhibited to the Protector to accept of the Crowne.

In Rotulo Parliamenti tenti apud Weſtmonaſterium die Veneris viceſimo tertio die Ianuarij, Anno Regni Regis Richardi tertij, primo inter alia continetur vt ſequitur.

Memorandum quod quædam billa exhibita fuit coram Domino Rege in Parliamento prædicto in hac verba:

Where late heretofore, that is to ſay, before the conſecration, coronation, and inthronization of our Soueraigne Lord the King, Richard the third, a roll of Parchment containing in writing certaine Articles of the Tenour vnder-written, on the behalfe, and in the name of the three Eſtates of this Realme of England, that is to wit, of the Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and of the Commons by name, and diuers Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and other Nobles and notable perſons of the Commons in great multitude was preſented, and actually deliuered vnto our ſaid Soueraigne Lord, the intent and effect expreſſed at large in the ſame Roll: to the which Roll, and to the conſiderations, and inſtant petition comprized in the ſame, our ſaid Soueraigne Lord, for the publique-weale and tranquillitie of this Land, benignely aſſented. Now foraſmuch as neither the ſaid three Eſtates, neither the ſaid perſons which in their name preſented, and deliuered as it is aforeſaid, the ſaid Roll vnto our ſaid Soueraigne Lord the King, were aſſembled in forme of Parliament: by reaſon whereof, diuers doubts, queſtions, and ambiguities beene mooued, and engendred in the mindes of diuers perſons, as it is ſaid: Therefore to the perpetuall memory of the truth, and declaration of the ſame, bee it ordained, prouided, and eſtabliſhed in this preſent Parliament, that the Tenor of the ſaid Roll, with all the contents of the ſame, preſented as is abouesaid, and deliuered to our foreſaid Soueraigne Lord the King, in the name and in the behalfe of the ſaid three Eſtates out of Parliament, now by the ſame ſame three Eſtates aſſembled in this preſent Parliament, and by authoritie of the ſame be ratified, enrolled, recorded, approoued, and authorized into remoouing the occaſions of doubts and ambiguities, and to all other lawfull effects that ſhall now thereof enſue: So that all things ſaid, affirmed, ſpecified, deſired and remembred in the ſaid Roll, and in the Tenor of the ſame vnder-written, in the name of the ſaid three Eſtates, to the effect expreſſed in the ſame Roll, be of the like effect, vertue, and force, as if all the ſame things had beene ſo ſaid, affirmed, ſpecified, deſired and remembred in a full Parliament, and by authoritie of the ſame accepted and approoued. The Tenor of the ſaid Roll, of Parchment, whereof aboue is made mention, followeth, and is ſuch.

The petition of the Kings election made lawfull, and authorized by Parliament.

To the high and Mightie Prince,
Richard Duke of Glouceſter.

The forme of the petition exhibited vnto the Protector.

Pleaſe it your noble Grace to vnderſtand the conſiderations, election and petition vnder-written of vs, the Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and Commons of this Realme of England, and thereunto agreeably to giue your aſſent to the common and publique weale of this Land, to the comfort and gladneſſe of all the people of the ſame. Firſt, wee conſider how that heretofore in time-paſſed, this Land many yeeres ſtood in great proſperitie, honour, and tranquillitie, which was cauſed, forſomuch as the King then raigning, vſed and followed the aduice and counſell of certaine Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and other perſons of approoued ſadneſſe, prudence, policie and experience dreading God, and hauing tender zeale and affection to indifferent miniſtration of juſtice, and to the common and publique weale of the Land: Then our Lord God was dread, loued and honoured; then within the Land was peace and tranquillitie, and among Neighbours concord and charitie; then the malice of outward enemies was mightily reſiſted and repreſſed, and the Land honourably defended, with many great and glorious victories; then the entercourſe of Merchants was largely vſed and exerciſed: by which things aboue-remembred, the Land was greatly enriched, ſo that aſwell the Merchants and Artificers, as other poore people, labouring for their liuings in diuers occupations, had competent gaine, to the ſuſtentation of them and their houſholds, liuing without miſerable and intolerable pouertie: but afterward, when that ſuch as had the rule and gouernance of this Land, delighting in adulation and flattery, and led by ſenſualitie and concupiſcence, followed the counſell of perſons inſolent, vicious, and of inordinate auarice, deſpiſing the counſell of good, vertuous, and prudent perſons, ſuch as aboue be remembred; The proſperitie of this Land daily decreaſed, ſo that felicity was turned into miſery, and proſperitie into aduerſitie, and the order of policy and of the Law of God and Man confounded, whereby it is likely this Realme to fall into extreme miſery and deſolation (which God defend) without due prouiſion of couenable remedy be had in this behalfe, in all goodly haſte.

O time, how doeſt thou turne, and art turned!

Faire glozes vpon foule pretences.

(3) Ouer this, among other things more ſpeciall, we conſider, how that the time of the Raigne of King Edward the fourth late deceaſed, after the vngracious pretenſed marriage (as all England hath cauſe ſo to ſay) made betwixt the ſaid King Edward, and Elizabeth ſometimes wife to Sir Iohn Grey Knight, late naming her ſelfe, and many yeeres heretofore Queene of England, the order of all politicke rule was peruerted, the Lawes of God, and of Gods Church, and alſo the Lawes of Nature, and of England, and alſo of the laudable Cuſtomes and Liberties of the ſame, wherein euery Engliſh-man is inheritor, broken, ſubuerted, and contemned, againſt all reaſon and juſtice, ſo that the Land was ruled by ſelfe-will and pleaſure, feare and dread, all manner of equitie and law laid apart and deſpiſed, whereof enſued many inconueniences and miſchiefes, as murthers, extortions, and oppreſſions, namely, of poore and impotent people, ſo that no man was ſure of his life, land or liuelyhood, ne of his Wife, Daughter nor ſeruant, euery good maiden and woman ſtanding in dread to be rauiſhed and deflowred: and beſides this, what diſcords, inward battels, effuſion of Chriſtian mens blood, and namely, by the deſtruction of the Nobles blood of this Land, was had and committed within the ſame, it is euident and notary thorow all this Realme, vnto the great ſorrow and heauineſſe of all true Engliſh-men.

Flattery feares not how to report.

How can Princes rule to ſhun reproach when they are dead?

And

And here alſo we conſider, how that the ſaid pretended marriage betwixt the aboue-named King Edward and Elizabeth Grey, was made of great preſumption without the knowing and aſſent of the Lords of this Land, and alſo by ſorcery and witch-craft committed by the ſaid Elizabeth, and her Mother Iaquet Dutcheſſe of Bedford, as the common opinion of the people, and the publike voice and fame is thorow all this Land: and hereafter if the cauſe ſhall require, ſhall be prooued ſufficiently in time and place conuenient. And here alſo we conſider how that the ſaid pretenſed marriage was made priuily and ſecretly, without edition of banes, in a priuate chamber, a prophane place, and not openly in the face of the Church, after the Law of Gods Church, but contrary thereunto, and the laudable cuſtome of the Church of England. And how alſo that at the time of contract of the ſame pretended marriage, and before, and long time after, the ſaid King Edward was and ſtood married, and troth-plight to one Dame Eleanor Butler, daughter of the old Earle of Shrewsbury, with whom the ſame Edward had made a pre-contract of Matrimony, long time before he made the ſaid pretenſed marriage with the ſaid Elizabeth Grey, in manner and forme aforeſaid: which Premiſſes being true, as in very truth they beene true: it appeareth, and followeth euidently, that the ſaid King Edward during his life, and the ſaid Elizabeth liued together ſinfully and damnably in adultery, againſt the Law of God and of his Church: And therefore no maruell that the Soueraigne Lord, and the head of this Land, being of ſuch vngodly diſpoſition, and prouoking the ire and indignation of our Lord God; ſuch hainous miſchiefe and inconueniences as are aboue-remembred, were vſed and committed in the Realme, among the Subjects. Alſo it appeareth euidently, and followeth, that all the Iſſue and Children of the ſaid King Edward, been baſtards, and vnable to inherit, or to claime any thing by inheritance, by the Law and Cuſtome of England.

The Queene and her mother falſely ſlandered.

King Edward accuſed to haue beene contracted to the Lady Eleanor Butler.

The tongue of ſlander is a ſharpe arrow.

They haue taught their tongues to ſpeake lyes. Ier. 9. 5.

(4) Moreouer, we conſider how that afterwards by the three Eſtates of this Realme aſſembled in Parliament, holden at Weſtminſter the 17. yeere of the Raigne of the ſaid King Edward the fourth, he then being in poſſeſſion of the Crowne and Royall eſtate by Act made in the ſame Parliament, George Duke of Clarence, Brother to the ſaid King Edward now deceaſed, was conuicted and attainted of high Treaſon, as in the ſame Act is contained more at large, by cauſe and reaſon whereof, all the Iſſue of the ſaid George, was and is diſabled and barred of all right and claime that in any caſe they might haue or challenge by inheritance to the Crowne and dignity-Royall of this Realme, by the ancient Law and Cuſtome of this ſame Realme.

George Duke of Clarence and his heires made vncapable of the Crowne.

Ouer this, we conſider that ye be the vndoubted Sonne and heire of Richard late Duke of Yorke, very inheritor of the ſaid Crowne and dignitie-Royall, and as in right King of England by way of inheritance: and that at this time the premiſſes duely conſidered, there is none other perſon liuing, but ye onely that by right may claime the ſaid Crowne and dignity-royall by way of inheritance, and how that yee be borne within this Land; by reaſon whereof, as we deeme in our mindes, yee be more naturally inclined to the proſperitie and Common-weale of the ſame: and all the three Eſtates of the Land haue and may haue more certaine knowledge of your birth and filiation aforeſaid. We conſider alſo the great wit, prudence, juſtice, princely courage, and the memorable and laudable acts in diuers battels, which as wee by experience know you heretofore haue done, for the ſaluation and defence of this ſame Realme; and alſo the great nobleneſſe and excellency of your birth and blood, as of him that is deſcended of the three moſt Royall Houſes in Chriſtendome: that is to ſay, England, France, and Spaine: Wherefore theſe premiſſes by vs diligently conſidered, wee deſiring effectually the peace, tranquillitie and weale-publique of this Land, and the reduction of the ſame to the ancient honourable eſtate and proſperitie, and hauing in your great prudence, juſtice, princely courage, and excellent vertue, ſingular confidence, haue choſen in all that in vs is, and by this our writing chooſe you High and Mighty Prince our King and Soueraigne Lord, &c. To whom wee know for certaine it appertaineth of inheritance ſo to be choſen. And hereupon wee humbly deſire, pray, and require your moſt noble Grace, that according to this election of vs the three Eſtates of this Land, as by your true inheritance, you will accept and take vpon you you the ſaid Crowne and Royall dignitie, with all things thereunto annexed and appertaining, as to you of right belonging, aſwell by inheritance as by lawfull election: and in caſe you ſo doe, wee promiſe to ſerue and aſſiſt your Highneſſe, as true and faithfull Subjects, and Liege-men; and to liue and die with you in this matter, and in euery other juſt quarrell. For certainly, wee be determined rather to aduenture and commit vs to the perill of our liues, and jeopardy of death, then to liue in ſuch thraldome and bondage as we haue liued long time heretofore, oppreſſed and injured by extortions, and new impoſitions, againſt the Law of God and man, and the liberty, old policie and Lawes of this Realme, wherein euery Engliſhman is inherited. Our LORD GOD, KING of all KINGS, by whoſe infinite goodneſſe and eternall prouidence all things beene principally gouerned in this world; lighten your ſoule, and grant you grace to doe as well in this matter as in all other, that may be according to his will and pleaſure, and to the common and publique weale of this Land: ſo that after great clouds, trouble, ſtormes, and tempeſts, the Sunne of Iuſtice and of Grace may ſhine vpon vs, to the comfort and gladneſſe of all true-hearted Engliſhmen. Albeit, that the right, title, and eſtate, which our Soueraigne Lord the King, Richard the third hath to, and in the Crowne and Royall dignitie of this Realme of England; with all things thereunto within the ſame Realme, and without it vnited, annexed and appertaining, beene juſt and lawfull, as grounded vpon the Lawes of God, and of nature: and alſo vpon the ancient Lawes and laudable cuſtomes of this ſaid Realme; and ſo taken and reputed by all ſuch perſons as beene learned in the aboue-ſaid lawes and cuſtomes: Yet neuertheleſſe, foraſmuch as it is conſidered, that the moſt part of the people is not ſufficiently learned in the aboue-ſaid Lawes and cuſtomes, whereby the truth and right in this behalfe, of likelyhood may be hid, and not clearely knowne to all the people, and thereupon put in doubt and queſtion: And ouer this, how that the Court of Parliament is of ſuch authoritie, and the people of this Land of ſuch a nature and diſpoſition, as experience teacheth, that manifeſtation and declaration of any truth or right made by the three Eſtates of this Realme aſſembled in Parliament, and by the authoritie of the ſame, maketh before all other things moſt faith and certaine, and quieting of mens minds, remooueth the occaſion of all doubts, and ſeditious language: Therefore, at the requeſt, and by the aſſent of the three Eſtates of this Realme; that is to ſay, the Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and Commons of this Land, aſſembled in this preſent Parliament, by authoritie of the ſame, be it pronounced, decreed, and declared, that our ſaid Soueraigne Lord the King was, and is, the very vndoubted King of this Realme of England, with all things thereunto within the ſame Realme, and without it vnited, annexed, and appertaining, aſwell by right of Conſanguinitie, and inheritance, as by lawfull election, conſecration, and coronation. And ouer this, that at the requeſt, and by the aſſent and authoritie aboue-ſaid, be it ordained, enacted and eſtabliſhed, that the ſaid Crowne and Royall dignitie of this Realme, and the inheritance of the ſame, and all other things thereunto within the Realme, or without, is vnited, annexed, and now appertaining, reſt and abide in the perſon of our ſaid Soueraigne Lord the King, during his life, and after his deceaſe, in his heires of his body begotten; and in eſpeciall at the requeſt, and by aſſent and authority aboue-ſaid, be it ordained, enacted, eſtabliſhed, pronounced, decreed, and declared, that the high and excellent Prince Edward, Sonne of our ſaid Soueraigne Lord the King, be heire apparant of the ſame our Soueraigne Lord the King, to ſucceed to him in the aboue-ſaid Crowne and Royall dignitie, with all things as is aforeſaid thereunto vnited, annexed, and appertaining, to haue them after the deceaſe of our ſaid Soueraigne Lord the King, to him, and to his heires of his body lawfully begotten.

As bad his claime as his perſon deformed, but both made good by flatterers in Parliament.

Great pittie that ſo faire ſtems ſhould bring forth ſo bad a branch.

What cannot the Parliament effect, where all giue way to the sway of time?

(5) These things I haue laid forth more at large out of the Parliament Roll, that ye may vnderstand both what and how great matters the power of a Prince, the outward shew of vertue, the wily fetches of Lawyers, fawning hope, pensiue feare, desire of change, and goodly pretences, are able to effect, in that most wise assembly of all the States of a Kingdome, euen against all law and right, so that the saying of Salomon in this State seemed most true, that a liuing dogge is better then a dead Lyon. But this Richard is not to be accounted worthy to haue beene a Soueraigne, had he not beene a Soueraigne as Galba was reputed; who, when he was a Soueraigne, deceiued all mens expectation; but most worthy indeed of Soueraignty, had he not beene transported with ambition (which blasted all his good parts) by lewd practices, and by mischieuous meanes, made foule way thereunto: for that by the common consent of all that are wise, he was reckoned in the ranke of bad men, but of good Princes; as indeede King Richard through his short time of raigne is accounted to haue beene.

Eccles. 4. 9.

King Richard like vnto Galba, a bad Subiect, but a good Prince.

King Richard accepteth the Crowne, and beginneth his raigne with great applause.

(6) The Crowne and Scepter accepted as is said, King Richard vpon the twenty fifth of Iune, went in great pomp vnto Westminster Hall, and there in the Kings-Bench Court tooke his Seat, saying, that he would take vpon him the Crowne in that place, where the King himselfe ought to sit, whose chiefest duety was to administer Iustice to his people, and with a pleasing Oration so tickled the eares of his Auditors, that hee lulled the rurall to thinke that his like had neuer raigned in England; and to begin himself with a pretenced clemency, he pronounced pardon of all offences committed against him; for confirmation whereof, he sent for one Fog, whom he deadly hated, who for feare of him had lately taken Sanctuary at Westminster, and there in sight of the people, with semblance accordingly, tooke him by the hand, saying, that he would bee thenceforth his assured in affection; whereat the Commons greatly reioyced, and with applauses extolled, though others wiser among them tooke it to be but fained, to serue his owne turne. And in his way homeward, whomsoeuer he met, he saluted: for a mind that knoweth it selfe to be guilty, is in a manner deiected to a seruile flattery.

King Richards dealings double construed.

(7) King Richard, whose guilty heart was full of suspition, had sent for fiue thousand souldiers out of the North to be present in London at his Coronation; these, vnder the leading of Robin of Ridsdale, came vp both euill apparelled, and worse harnessed, in rusty Armour, neither defencible for proofe, nor scowred for shew: who mustering in Finesbury fields, were with disdaine gazed vpon by the beholders. But all things now ready for his Coronation (and much the sooner in that young Edwards prouision was conferred vpon his) vpon the fourth of Iuly, he with his Wife by water came to the Tower, where hee created Estates, ordained the Knights of the Bath, set at liberty the Archbishop of Yorke, and the Lord Stanley, more for feare then for loue; whose sonne the Lord Strange, was then said to be gathering of men in Lancashire, where those Lords haue great command.

(8) But Morton, Bishop of Ely, a firme man vnto King Edward, and vnpossible to be drawne vnto the disinheriting of his children, as was well perceiued by the Protector, among others, at the Councell held in the Tower, was left there prisoner, and accused of many great, but vnlikely treasons. This man borne in Dorsetshire, and brought vp in the Vniuersity of Oxford, was from a Doctor of the Arches made a priuy Councellor vnto King Henry, and after his death allured by King Edward to serue him, was sworne likewise of his Councell, and made one of the Executors of his will: whose insight into the intended designes, the Protector much feared, and therefore hauing him fast, minded so to keepe him, when hee released others laide in the Tower for the like feare. But the reuerence of the man, or vndeseruednesse of his wrongs, moued so the affection of the Oxford Academians, that they directed to the Ex Regiſt. Oxon. M. S.

A letter written for the Vniuerſity of Oxford in the behalfe of D. Morton.

" (9) Though many important motiues we haue, moſt Chriſtian King, " earneſtly to recommend to your " princely clemency, the Reuerend Father in Chriſt, the Lord Biſhop of Ely, as being not onely one of the moſt " eminent Sons of our Vniuerſity, but " alſo a ſingular Patrone and indulgent " Father to vs all; yet could not theſe " inducements (howſoeuer very ponderous with all gratefull mindes) perſwade vs to become interceſſors for " his pardon, but euer with due regard " both to your owne honour and ſafety; the greatneſſe of your princely " fauours hauing more obliged vs, " then of any your royall Predeceſſors: " whiles therefore wee ſtood in ſome " doubt, how he ſtood affected towards " your Highneſſe, wee held it an high " offence, if by tendring his ſafety, wee " ſhould any way hazzard yours: but " now, vnderſtanding that his offence " proceeded not of pertinacy, but humane frailety; and that he hath alwayes humbly ſued for pardon thereof, the bowels of our Mother Vniuerſity, like Rachel weeping ouer her Children, were moued with compaſſion ouer the deplored diſtreſſe of this " her deareſt ſonne; wherein yet (as we " hope) her affection deſerues no iuſt " reprehenſion. For, if a pious affection " be praiſe-worthy, euen in an enemy, " much more is it in this our Academy, " full of due obſeruance towards your " Maieſtie, and profeſſing the ſtudy of " all vertues. Theſe things ſo being, we " thought fit, (without longer delayes) " to flie vnto your clemency, as humble " Suppliants, that your Highneſſe, already hauing in part inflicted (though " mildly) ſome chaſtiſement on his fault, " would turne your royal aſpect towards " him, and impart to him the bounty of " your gracious clemency; wherein, " you ſhall not onely performe an act " moſt acceptable to him, to vs, and the " whole Church, but very honourable " and aduantagious alſo (as wee hope) " to your owne perſon. For, vpon notice of the re-admittance of ſo great a " Prelate into your grace, who is there, " that will not extoll with praiſes vnto " the skies your ſo great, and euen diuine clemency? Thus gloried the Romanes, to haue it marſhalled amongſt " their praiſes, that * Submiſſiue wights " they ſpared, but cruſht the proud; and " this alſo they challenged as their peculiar honour, that they were readier " to remit, thē to reuenge wrongs. Now " if you will aſpire to this high honour, " (as eaſily you may, by being gracious " to this man) you ſhall ſurmount the " Romanes themſelues by ſo glorious a " deed. As for the great benefit which " may hereby accrue to your Highneſſe, " albeit (as we ſuppoſe) we can ſufficiently conceiue thereof, eſpecially if we " call to minde his ſingular vertues; yet " had we rather leaue that point wholly to your ſecret conſiderations, then " purſue it with a diſcourſe tedious to " you, and enuie breeding to him: leſt " haply by inſiſting in his praiſes, it " may be thought, that we ſeeke rather " by violence to extort, then by ſubmiſſiueneſſe to beg his pardon, and or elſe " to relie more on the greatneſſe of his " vertues, then of your Clemency, or laſtly to appeale rather to your Iuſtice, " then to your mercy. Wherefore (moſt " puiſſant Prince) thus perſwade your " ſelfe of vs, that whatſoeuer we haue " ſpoken in the Biſhops behalfe, we doe " it rather out of a ſenſe of our dutifulneſſe then any diffidency of your Graciouſneſſe: and therefore omitting " all things which might be alleadged, " either to leſſen his offence, or augment " his vertues: it is your ſole mercy wher" in we repoſe all our hopes; vowing, " howſoeuer other meanes of gratitude " may be wanting to vs, yet we ſhall neuer ſuffer the remembrance of ſo great " a fauour conferred on vs to be extinguiſhed amongſt vs.

(10) King Richard, after this, intending ſome eaſier reſtraint, though not liberty vnto the Biſhop, was content to releaſe him out of the Tower, and committed him to the cuſtody of Henry Duke of Buckingham, who ſent him to his Caſtle of Brecknocke in Wales, there ſafely to be kept, vntill himſelfe ſhould come thither.

Biſhop Morton committed to the cuſtody of the Duke of Buckingham.

(11) The next day with great pomp, ſtate and attendance of the Nobility, the King rode thorow London, ſo as a more royall had not beene ſeene at any Kings Coronation, for there attended him, three Dukes, nine Earles, two Viſcounts, twenty Lords, ſeuenty eight Knights, all of them moſt richly furniſhed, shed, whereof the Duke of Buckingham so farre exceeded, that the caparison of his Horse was so charged with embroydered worke of gold, as it was borne vp from the ground by certaine his foot-men thereto appointed. And contrary to my owne affections, or manner of my former proceedings, I will yet continue the most honourable offices performed at his Royall enthroning with no little Admiration, how these Lords assembled to set the Crowne vpon the young Princes head, were so suddenly carried to crowne his Protector, and that vpon such false and slanderous pretences, as euery one of them saw his Title to be meerely an vnjust vsurpation, but in them may be seene, that we are all the Sonnes of Adam, and in times of extremities, fore-slow all publique regard, as ouer-much fearing our priuate and present estate.

(12) Vpon the sixt of Iuly, King Richard with Queene Anne his wife set forth from White-Hall towards Westminster, royally attended, and went into the Kings-Bench in the great Hall, from whence himselfe and Queene vpon ray Cloth, both of them bare-footed, went vnto King Edwards shrine in Saint Peters Church, all the Nobilitie going with him in their degree, the Trumpets and Heralds marshalling the way, the Crosse with a solemne processiion followed, the Priests in fine surpleses and gray Amysses vpon them, the Bishops and Abbots in rich Copes, all of them mytred, and carrying their Crosses in their hands; next came the Earle of Huntington bearing a paire of gilt spurres, signifying Knighthood; after whom came the Earle of Bedford, who bare Saint Edwards staffe for a Relique, then followed the Earle of Northumberland with a naked pointlesse sword in his hand, betokening Mercy, next whom the Lord Stanley bare the Mace of the Constableship, vpon whose right hand the Earle of Kent bare a naked pointed sword, and on his left-hand the Lord Louell the like naked pointed sword, the former signifying Iustice towards the temporaltie, and the other Iustice to the Clergy; the Duke of Suffolke then followed with the Scepter, which signified Peace: the Earle of Lincolne bare the Ball and Crosse, which signified a Monarchy: Then came the Earle of Surrey, bearing the fourth sword, sheathed in a rich scabberd, and is called the sword of Estate, next whom followed Garter King at Armes, vpon whose right hand went the Gentleman-Vsher of the Kings priuy Chamber, and on his left the Lord Major of London, with a Mace in his hand; Next vnto whō went the Duke of Norfolke, bearing the Kings Crown betwixt his hands, and then King Richard himselfe came, in a Surcote and Robe of purple Veluet; hauing ouer his head a Canopie borne by the foure Barons of the fiue Ports, the Bishop of Bath on his right hand, and of Durham on his left. The Duke of Buckingham bare the Kings traine, and to signifie the office of High Steward of England, hee bare a White Staffe in his hand.

(13) Then followed the Queenes traine: before whom was borne the Scepter, the Iuory Rod with the Doue and the Crowne; her selfe apparelled in Robes like the Kings, vnder a rich Canopie, at euery corner thereof a bell of gold. On her head shee ware a circlet set full of precious stones, the Countesse of Richmond bearing her traine; the Dutchesse of Norfolke & Suffolke in their Coronets attendants, with twenty Ladies of Estate most richly attired. In this order they passed the Palace into the Abbey, and ascending to the high Altar, there shifted their Robes, and hauing other Robes open in diuers places from the middle vpward, were both of them anointed, and crowned, he with Saint Edwards Crowne, hauing the Scepter deliuered into his left hand, and the Ball with the Crosse, a token of Monarchie in his right; the Queene had a Scepter giuen into her right hand, and the Iuory Doue in her left; then after the Sacrament receiued (hauing the host diuided betwixt them) they both offered at S. Edwards shrine, where the King left his Crowne and put on his owne; and thus done, in the same Order and State as they came, returned to Westminster-Hall, and there held a most Princely Feast. Whereof let Hall and Grafton tell you for me.

(14) But this his faire Sun was soone ouercast with many darke Cloudes and mischiefes, which fell thicke vpon the necke of each other: for as the thing euill-gotten, is neuer well kept; through al the time of his raigne there neuer ceased death and slaughter, till his own destruction ended it. Yet as he finished his daies with the best death, and the most righteous, that is to say, his owne: so began he with the moſt pittious and wicked, I meane the lamentable murther of his innocent Nephewes, the young King and his tender Brother; whoſe deaths and finall miſ-fortunes haue neuertheleſſe come ſo farre in queſtion, that ſome remaine yet in doubt, whether they were in his dayes deſtroyed or no. Not for that onely, that Perkin Warbeck, by the malice of many, and the folly of more, ſo long a time abuſing the world, was aſwell with Princes, as the other poore people, reputed and taken for the younger of theſe two: but for that alſo as all things were in late daies ſo couertly demeaned, one thing pretended, and another done, that there was nothing ſo plaine and openly proued, but for the common cuſtome and cloſe couert dealing, men had it euer inwardly in ſuſpect, as many well counterfeit Iewels make the true miſtruſted. Howbeit concerning the opinion, with the occaſions mouing either party, wee ſhall haue place more at large hereafter to intreat of: in the meane time for this preſent matter, ſhall be rehearſed the dolorous end of theſe young Babes, not after euery report I haue heard, but by ſuch men, and by ſuch meanes, as to my ſeeming it were hard but it ſhould be true, ſaith Sir Thomas Moore.

Doubts made of the two Princes deaths.

(15) King Richard preſently after his mockiſh Election and glorious Coronation, made his progreſſe towards Glouceſter, to ſhew (as was thought) in that City his new Kingly eſtate, which firſt had vouchſafed him his old honour in bearing her Title; or elſe, and that rather, to be ſequeſtred from other buſineſſe, the better to attend that, vpon which his thoughts moſt buſily ranne. For albeit the Barke of his begun aduentures, had without perill well paſſed the ſtraights, and now got ſea-roome to ſpread ſaile at will; yet being vnder gale, and at fortunes diſpoſe, he feared the guſt of euery winde: at leaſt-wiſe ſuſpected that his young Nephewes liuing, would ſtay the courſe of his deepe reaches, as doth the little fiſh Remora, who holdeth (as at Anchor) the biggeſt ſhip vnder ſaile. His inward ſtudy therefore ſtill forged, howſoeuer his outward countenance was carried, to cleare his paſſage, by taking thoſe dangerous lets away, well knowing, that his little Nephewes enioying their liues, men would be medling with their downe-caſt cauſe, and account him an Vſurper without all right to the Realme. To ſtop which ſtreame, no other courſe could he finde, but to cut off the current by which it ranne, as though the killing of his Kinſmen could better his bad claime, or vnkindly murther make him a kindly King. But being reſolued, hee forthwith ſent one Iohn Greene, a ſeruant in eſpeciall truſt, vnto Sir Robert Brakenburie, Conſtable of the Tower, with a letter of credence, that the ſame Sir Robert ſhould in any wiſe put the two children to death.

King Richard his letter to Sir Robert Brakenbury.

(16) This Greene thus poſted to London, deliuered his errand vnto Brakenbury, whom he found kneeling at his Orizons before the Image of our Lady in the Tower, the buſineſſe being of ſuch weight, as the King muſt be ſerued before hee had ended with his Saint. The Conſtable reading the Letter, and perceiuing the bloody intent of the King, anſwered plainly, he would neuer put thoſe innocent babes vnto death, to dye therefore himſelfe. With which anſwere Iohn Greene returning, recounted the ſame to King Richard being at Warwicke, yet in his way to Glocester, wherewith hee was maruellouſly perplexed, and thereat tooke ſuch diſpleaſure, that the ſame night hee ſaid to a ſecret Page of his: Ah, whom ſhall a man truſt? thoſe that I haue brought vp my ſelfe, thoſe that I had weened would moſt ſurely ſerue mee, euen thoſe fayle mee, and at my commandement will doe nothing. Sir, quoth the Page, there lyeth one on your Pallet without, that I dare well ſay, to doe your Grace pleaſure, the thing were right hard that he would refuſe; meaning this by Sir Iames Tirrell, who was a man of a goodly Perſonage, and for Natures gifts worthy to haue ſerued a much better Prince, if he had well ſerued God, and by grace obtained as much truth and good will, as hee had ſtrength and wit.

Iames Tirrell made the Inſtrument of murther.

(17) The man had an high heart, and ſore longed vpward, not riſing yet ſo faſt as he hoped, being hindred and kept vnder by the meanes of Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir William Catesby, who longing for no more partners of the Princes fauour, and namely, not for him, whoſe pride they knew would beare no Peere, kept him by ſecret drifts out of all ſecret truſt, which thing this Page had well marked and knowne: wherefore this occaſion offered of very ſpeciall friendſhip, hee tooke his his time to put him forward, and by such wise to doe him good, that all the enemies he had, except the Diuell himselfe, could neuer haue done him so much hurt. For vpon this Pages words, King Richard arose (for this communication had he sitting at the draught, a conuenient Carpet for such a counsell) and came out into a Pallet-Chamber, where he found in bed, Sir Iames and Sir Thomas Tirrels, of persons much like, and Brethren in blood, but nothing of kinne in conditions: Then said the King merrily to them, What Sirs, be ye in bed so soone? and calling vp Sir Iames, brake to him secretly his minde in this mischieuous matter, in which he found him nothing strange. Wherefore on the morrow he sent him to Brakenbury with a Letter, by which he was commanded to deliuer Sir Iames all the keyes of the Tower for one night, to the end hee might accomplish there the Kings pleasure in such things as hee had giuen him in commandement. After which Letter deliuered, and the keyes receiued, Sir Iames appointed the night next ensuing to destroy them, deuising before, and preparing the meanes.

Sir Iames ready to fulfill the Kings minde in the murther of the Princes.

(18) The Prince in the Tower slenderly attended; and altogether neglected by the Nobility, lastly, had newes that his Vncle had left the name of Protector, and taken vpon him the Title of King, who with full consent of the Lords was to be crowned within a few daies following, with the same Crowne, and in the like estate as had beene prouided for his solemnitie: whereat the dejected Innocent sighed and said; Alasse, I would my Vncle would let mee enjoy my life yet, though I lose both my Kingdome and Crowne. Which words hee pronounced with such a feeling feare, as much mooued the Relater to pitty, and to perswade him with the best comforts he could: but forthwith the Prince and his Brother were both shut vp, and all attendants remooued from them, onely one called Black-Will, or William Slaughter excepted, who was set to serue them, and see them sure. After which time the Prince neuer tyed his points, nor cared for himselfe; but with that young Babe his Brother lingered with thought and heauinesse, till their traiterous deaths deliuered them out of that wretchednesse: for the execution whereof, Tirrell appointed Miles Forrest, one of the foure that kept them, a fellow fleshed in murther before-time: To whom hee joyned one Iohn Dighton his Horsekeeper, a bigge, broad, square knaue.

The words of Prince Edward when he heard that his Vncle should be King.

The faithfull seruants of the Prince remooued from him.

(19) About mid-night (all others being remoued from them,) this Miles Forrest, and Iohn Dighton, came into the Chamber, and suddenly wrapped vp the silly Children in the Bed-clothes, where they lay, keeping by force the Feather-bed and pillowes hard vpon their mouthes, that they were therein smothered to death, and gaue vp to God their innocent soules into the joyes of Heauen, leauing their bodies vnto the Tormentors dead in the Bed: which after these monstrous wretches perceiued, first by the strugling with the paines of death, and after long lying still, to be throughly dispatched, they laid their bodies naked out vpon the Bed, and then fetched Sir Iames, their instigator, to see them, who caused these murtherers to bury them at the staires foot, somewhat deepe in the ground, vnder a great heape of stones. Then rode Sir Iames in haste to the King, vnto whom he shewed the manner of their death, and place of buriall, which newes was so welcome to his wicked heart, as he greatly rejoyced, and with great thankes dubbed (as some hold) this his mercilesse Instrument, Knight. But the place of their buriall he liked not, saying, that vile corner should not containe the bodies of those Princes, his Nephewes, and commanded them a better place for buriall, because they were the sonnes of a King. Whereupon the Priest of the Tower tooke vp the bodies, and secretly interred them in such place, which by the occasion of his death could neuer since come to light.

Prince Edward and his brother murthered in a feather-bed.

Their bodies were buried vnder a paire of staires.

The body of the two Princes remooued, and buried no man knowes where.

(20) The continuer of Iohn Harding tels vs, from the report of others, that King Richard caused Sir Robert Brakenburies Priest to close their dead corps in lead, and so to put them in a coffin full of holes, and hooked at the ends with two hookes of Iron, and so to cast them into a place called the Black-deepes at the Thames mouth, whereby they should neuer rise vp, or be any more seene. Whersoeuer they were buried, thus they died, and by these murtherers. For very certaine it is, and well knowne, that at such time as Sir Iames Tirrell was in the Tower, for Treason committed against King Henry the seuenth, both Dighton and he were examined, and confessed the murther in manner as is said, but but whither their bodies were remoued they could not ſay. And thus as I haue learned of them that knew much, and little cauſe had to lie, were theſe two noble Princes, theſe innocent tender children, born of moſt royal blood, brought vp in great wealth, likely to haue liued, to haue raigned, & ruled in the Realme, by traiterous tyranny taken, depriued of their eſtates, ſhortly ſhut vp in priſon, and impiouſly murdered, and the body caſt out, God wot where, by the cruell ambition of their vnnaturall Vncle, and his helliſh Tormentors. Which things on euery part well pondered; God neuer gaue this world a more notable example, neither in what vnſurety ſtandeth this worldly weale, or what miſchiefe worketh the proud enterprize of an high heart, or finally, what wretched end enſueth ſuch barbarous crueltie.

The vnconſtant ſtate of mans life.

Gods juſtice and reuenge vpon the murtherers.

(20) For firſt to begin with the Miniſters, Miles Forreſt, at Saint Martins, piece-meale rotted away; Sir Iames Tirrell died at Tower-hill for Treaſon; Dighton indeed walketh on aliue in good poſſibility to be hanged ere he die, liuing at Callis no leſſe diſtained and hated then pointed at of all. King Richard himſelfe, as yee ſhall hereafter heare, was ſlaine in the field, hacked and hewed of his enemies hands, carried on horſebacke dead, his haire in deſpite torne and tugged like a Curre-dogge: and the miſchiefe that he tooke, was within leſſe then three yeeres of the miſchiefe that he did, and yet all the meane time ſpent in much paine and trouble outward, and much feare, anguiſh, and ſorrow within. For I haue heard, by credible report, of ſuch as were ſecret with his Chamberlaine, that after this abominable deed done, he neuer had quiet in his minde: hee neuer thought himſelfe ſure: but where hee went abroad, his eyes euer whirled about, his body priuily fenced, his hand euer on his dagger, his countenance and manner like ones alwaies ready to ſtrike againe, hee tooke ill reſt a nights, lay long waking and muſing, ſore wearied with care and watch, rather ſlumbred then ſlept, troubled with fearefull dreames, ſuddenly ſometimes ſtart vp, leapt out of his Bed, and ranne about the Chamber, ſo was his reſtleſſe heart continually toſſed and tumbled with the tedious impreſſion and ſtormy remembrance of his abominable deed. Neither had he in his beſt, any time of quiet, for immediately began the conſpiracie (or rather good conſideration) betweene the Duke of Buckingham, and diuers other Gentlemen againſt him.

Outward enemies ariſe againſt King Richard.

(21) Which Duke as ſoone as Glouceſter vpon the death of King Edward came to Yorke, ſent thither in ſecret wiſe a truſty ſeruant of his, named Perſall, to aſſure him, that he would take his part in this his new world, and if need were, would waite vpon him with a thouſand good-fellowes: and againe ſent offers of the like vnto Nottingham, whither the Protector from Yorke, with many Gentlemen of the North Countrey was come, and on his way to London-ward in ſecret manner met him himſelfe, but at Northampton openly with three hundred horſe: and from thence ſtill continued with him, being a partner of all his deuices, till that after his Coronation they departed (as it ſeemed) very great friends at Glouceſter: from whence as ſoone as the Duke came home, he ſo lightly turned from him, and ſo highly conſpired againſt him, that a man would maruell whereof the change grew. And ſurely the occaſion of their variance is of diuers men, diuerſely reported; Some haue ſaid, that the Duke a little before the Coronation, among other things, required of the Protector, the Duke of Hertfords Lands, to the which he pretended himſelfe juſt inheritor. And foraſmuch as the Title which hee claimed by inheritance, was ſomewhat interlaced with the Title of the Crowne, by the line of King Henry before depriued, the Protector conceiued ſuch indignation, that he rejected the Dukes requeſt, with many ſpightfull and minatory words, which ſo wounded his heart with hatred and miſtruſt, that hee neuer after could indure to looke aright on King Richard, but euer feared his owne life, ſo farre forth, that when the Protector rode thorow London towards his Coronation, he fained himſelfe ſicke, becauſe he would not ride with him: And the other taking it in euill part, ſent him word to riſe, and come ride, or hee would make him to be carried. Whereupon hee rode on with an euill will, and that notwithſtanding, on the morrow roſe from the Feaſt, faining himſelfe ſick, whereat King Richard ſaid, it was done in hatred and deſpite of him. And they ſay, that euer after continually each of them liued in ſuch hatred and diſtruſt of other, as the Duke verily looked ked to haue beene murthered at Glouceſter: from which neuertheleſſe hee in faire manner departed. But ſurely ſome right ſecret, at this day, deny this: and many right wiſe men thinke it vnlikely (the deepe diſſembling nature of both thoſe men conſidered, and what need in that greene world the Protector had of the Duke, and in what perill the Duke ſtood, if he fell once in ſuſpition of the Tyrant) that either the Protector would giue the Duke occaſion of diſpleaſure, or the Duke the Protector occaſion of miſtruſt. And verily men thinke, that if King Richard had any ſuch conceiued opinion, he would neuer haue ſuffered the Duke to haue eſcaped his hands.

No ſuch ſuſpition betwixt the King and the Duke as was ſaid to be.

(22) The very truth is, Buckingham was an high-minded man, and could euill beare the glory of another; ſo that I haue heard of ſome that ſaw it, that the Duke at ſuch time as the Crowne was firſt ſet vpon the Protectors head, his eye could not abide the ſight thereof, but wried his face another way. But men ſay, that he was of truth not well at eaſe, which to King Richard was well knowne, and nothing ill taken, nor any demand of the Dukes vncourteouſly reiected, but he both with great gifts and high beheſts, in moſt louing and truſty manner, departed at Glouceſter. But ſoone after his comming home to Brecknocke, hauing there in cuſtody, by the commandement of King Richard, Doctor Morton Biſhop of Ely, who (yee before heard) was taken in the counſell at the Tower, waxed with him familiar: whoſe wiſedome abuſed his pride to his owne deliuerance, and the Dukes deſtruction.

The diuers opinions of the King & Dukes falling out.

The ſtory of Biſhop Morton.

(23) This Biſhop was a man of great naturall wit, very well learned, and honourable in behauiour, lacking no wiſe wayes to winne fauour: hee had beene faſt vpon the part of King Henry, while that part was in wealth; and naytheleſſe left it not, nor forſooke it in woe, but fled the Realme with Queene Margaret and Prince Edward, while King Edward had Henry in priſon, and neuer came home but to the field. After which loſt, and that ſide vtterly ſubdued, the other for his faſt faith and wiſedome not onely was content to receiue him, but alſo wooed him to come, and had him from thence-forth both in great ſecret truſt, and very ſpeciall fauour, which he nothing deceiued. For he being (as you haue heard) after King Edwards death, firſt taken by the Tyrant for his truth to the King, found the meanes to ſet this Duke in his top, joyned Gentlemen together in ayde of Earle Henry, deuiſing firſt the marriage betweene him and King Edwards Daughter: by which his faith, he declared the good ſeruice to both his maſters at once, with infinite benefit to the Realme, by the conjunction of thoſe two blouds in one; whoſe ſeuerall Titles had long time diſquieted the Land; he fled the Realme, went to Rome, neuer minding more to meddle with the world, till the noble Prince King Henry the ſeuenth got him home againe, made him Archbiſhop of Canterbury and Chancellour of England, whereunto the Pope joyned the honour of a Cardinall. Thus liuing many daies in as much honour as one man might well wiſh, ended them ſo godly, that his death with Gods mercy, well changed his life.

The vnion of Lanceſter and Yorke firſt ſet on by Biſhop Morton.

Morton made Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Lord Chancellor, and Cardinall.

(24) This man therefore, as I was about to tell you, by the long and often alternate proofe, as well of proſperity as aduerſe fortunes, had gotten by great experience (the very mother or miſtreſſe of Wiſedome) a deepe inſight in politique worldly drifts. Whereby perceiuing now this Duke glad to commune with him, fed him with faire words, and many pleaſant praiſes. And perceiuing by the proceſſe of their communication, the Dukes pride now and then balke out a little bread of enuy, towards the glory of the King, and thereby feeling him eaſie to fall out, if the matter were well handled: hee craftily ſought the waies to prick him forward, taking alwaies the occaſion of his comming, and keeping himſelfe ſo cloſe within his bounds, that he rather ſeemed to follow then to leade him. For when the Duke firſt began to praiſe and boaſt of the King, and ſhew how much profit the Realme ſhould take by his raigne; Morton anſwered thus: Surely my Lord, folly it were for me to lye, for if I would ſweare the contrary, your Lordſhip would not ween I beleeue, but that if the World would haue gone, as I could haue wiſhed, King Henries ſonne had had the Crowne, and not King Edward. But after that God had ordered him to loſe it, and King Edward to raigne, I was neuer ſo mad, that I would with a dead man ſtriue againſt a quicke. So was I to King Edward a faithfull Chaplaine, and glad would haue beene that his Child ſhould haue ſucceeded him. Howbeit, if the ſecret judgement of God haue otherwiſe prouided, I purpoſe not to ſpurne againſt the pricke, nor labour to ſet vp, that God putteth downe. And as for the late Protector and now King, and euen there he left: ſaying, that he had already meddled too much with the world, and would from that day meddle with his Booke, and his Beades, and no further.

(24) Then longed the Duke ſore to heare what he would haue ſaid, becauſe he ended with the King, & there ſo ſuddenly ſtopped, and exhorted him ſo familiarly, betweene them twaine, to be bold to ſay whatſoeuer hee thought, whereof hee faithfully promiſed there ſhould neuer come hurt, and peraduenture more good then he would weene, and that himſelfe intended to vſe his faithful, ſecret aduice and counſel, which he ſaid was the onely cauſe for which he procured of the King to haue him in his cuſtody, where he might account himſelfe at home, and elſe had he beene put in the hands of them with whom hee ſhould not haue found the like fauour. The Biſhop right humbly thanked him and ſaid: In good faith my Lord, I loue not to talke much of Princes, as a thing not all out of perill, though the word be without fault. For-aſmuch as it ſhall not bee taken as the party meant it, but as it pleaſeth the Prince to conſtrue it. And euer I thinke on Æſops tale, that when the Lyon had proclaimed vpon paine of death there ſhould no horned Beaſt abide in the Wood, one that had in his fore-head a bunch of fleſh, fled away a great pace. The Foxe who ſaw him runne ſo faſt, asked him whither hee made all that haſte? and he anſwered; In faith, I neither wot, nor recke, ſo I were once hence, becauſe of this Proclamation made againſt horned Beaſts. What, foole (quoth the Foxe) thou maiſt abide well enough, the Lyon meant not thee, for it is no horne that is in thy head. No marry (quoth he) that wot I well enough, but what if hee call it a horne, where am I then? The Duke laughed merrily at the tale, and ſaid, My Lord, I warrant you, neither the Lyon nor the Boare ſhall picke any matter at any thing here ſpoken, for it ſhall neuer come to their eares. In good faith, Sir, ſaid the Biſhop, if it did, the thing that I was about to ſay, (taken as well as afore God I meant it) could deſerue but thankes; & yet taken as I weene it would, might haply turne mee to little good, and you to leſſe. Then longed the Duke yet more to wit what it was; whereupon the Biſhop ſaid, In good faith my Lord, as for the late Protector, ſith he is now King in poſſeſſion, I purpoſe not to diſpute his title; but for the weale of this Realme, whereof his Grace hath now the gouernance, and my ſelfe am a poore member, I was about to wiſh, that to thoſe good abilities, whereof he hath already right many, little needing my praiſe; it might yet haue pleaſed God for the better ſtore, to haue giuen him ſome of ſuch other excellent vertues meete for the rule of a Realme as our Lord hath planted in the perſon of your Grace: and there left againe.

(25) The Duke ſomewhat maruailing at his ſudden pauſes: ſaid, My Lord, I note your often breathings and ſudden ſtopping in your communication; ſo that to my intelligence, your words neither come to any direct or perfect ſentence in concluſion, whereby either I might haue knowledge what your intent is now towards the King, or what affection you beare towards mee. For the compariſon of good qualities aſcribed to vs both, maketh me not a little to muſe, thinking that you haue ſome other priuy imagination imprinted in your heart, which you be abaſhed to diſcloſe, and ſpecially to me, which on my honour doe aſſure you to be as ſecret in this caſe, as the deafe and dumbe perſon to the ſinger, or the tree to the Hunter. The Biſhop being ſomewhat bolder, cõſidering the Dukes promiſe, but moſt of all animated, becauſe hee knew the Duke deſirous to be magnified, and alſo he perceiued the inward hatred which hee bare towards King Richard, he opened his ſtomacke to the bottome, and ſaid: My ſingular good Lord, ſith the time of my captiuity, which being in your Graces cuſtodie, I may rather call it a liberty, then a ſtrait impriſonment, in auoyding of idleneſſe, Mother of all vices; in reading Bookes and ancient Pamphlets, I haue found this ſentence written, that no man is borne free and at liberty of himſelfe onely: for one part of duetie he oweth to his Parents, another part to his friends and kindred; but the natiue Countrey in the which he firſt taſted this pleaſant and and flattering World, demandeth a debt not to be forgotten. Which saying, causeth mee to consider in what case the Realme, my natiue Countrey, now standeth; and in what estate and assurance before this time it hath continued; what Gouernour we now haue, and what Ruler wee might haue; for I plainely perceiue (the Realme being in this case) must needs decay, and be brought to confusion: but one hope I haue, that is, when I consider your noble Personage, your justice and indifferencie, your feruent zeale, and ardent loue towards your naturall Countrey; and in like manner, the loue of your Countrey towards you, the great learning, pregnant wit, and eloquence, which so much doth abound in your person; I must needes thinke this Realme fortunate, which hath such a Prince in store, meete and apt to bee Gouernour. But on the other side, when I call to memory the good qualities of the late Protector, and now called King, so violated by tyranny, so altered by vsurped authoritie, and so clouded by blind ambition, I must needs say, that he is neither meet to be King of so noble a Realme, nor so famous a Realme meete to be gouerned by such a Tyrant. Was not his first enterprize to obtaine the Crowne, begun by the murther of diuers Personages? did hee not secondarily proceed against his owne naturall mother; declaring her openly to be a woman giuen to carnall affection and dissolute liuing? declaring furthermore, his two Brethren, and two Nephewes, to be Bastards, and to be borne in adultery? yet not contented, after he had obtained the Garland, hee caused the two poore innocents his Nephewes, committed to him, to be most shamefully murthered: the blood of which little Babes daily cryeth to God from the earth for vengeance. What surety can be in this Land to any person, either for life or goods, vnder such a cruell Prince, which regardeth not the destruction of his owne blood, and much lesse the losse of others? But now to conclude, what I meane towards your noble person, I say and affirme: If you loue God, your Linage, or your natiue Countrey, you must your selfe take vpon you the Crowne of this Realme, both for the maintenance of the honour of the same, as also for the deliuerance of your naturall Countrey-men from the bondage of such a Tyrant. And if your selfe will refuse to take vpon you the Crowne of this Realme, then I adjure you by the faith you owe vnto God, to deuise some wayes how this Realme may be brought to some conuenient Regiment, vnder some good Gouernour. When the Bishop had ended his saying, the Duke sighed, and spake not of a great while: so that night they communed no more.

The Bishop perswadeth the Duke to take the Crowne vnto himselfe.

(26) The next day the Duke sent for the Bishop, to whom he said, My Lord of Ely, I must needs in heart thinke, and with mouth confesse, that you be a sure friend, a trusty Councellor, and a very louer of your Countrey. And sith that at our last communication, you haue disclosed the secrets of your heart touching the now Vsurper of the Crowne, and also haue a little touched the aduancement of the two Noble Families of Yorke and Lancaster, I shall likewise declare vnto you my priuy intents and secret cogitations. And to begin: When King Edward was deceased, I then began to study, and with deliberation to ponder in what manner this Realme should be gouerned: I perswaded with my selfe to take part with the Duke of Glouceſter, whom I thought to bee as cleane without dissimulation, as tractable without injurie, and so by my meanes he was made Protector both of the King and Realme; which authority being once gotten, he neuer ceased priuily to require me and other Lords, as well spirituall as temporall, that hee might take vpon him the Crowne, till the Prince came to the age of foure and twenty yeeres, and were able to gouerne the Realme as a sufficient King: which thing, when he saw me somewhat sticke at, he then brought in instruments, authenticke Doctors, Proctors, and Notaries of the Law, with depositions of diuers witnesses, testifying King Edwards Children to be Bastards: which depositions then I thought to be as true, as now I know them to be fained. When the said depositions were before vs read, and diligently heard, he stood vp bare-headed, saying: Well, my Lords, euen as I and you would that my Nephewes ſhould haue no wrong: ſo I pray you doe mee nothing but right, for theſe witneſſes and ſayings of famous Doctors be true: For I am onely the vndubitate heire to Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke, adjudged to be the very heire to the Crowne of this Realme by authoritie of Parliament. Which things things ſo by learned men for veritie to vs declared, cauſed mee and others to take him for our lawfull and vndoubted Prince, and Soueraigne Lord. So againe, by my ayde, hee of a Protector was made a King: but when hee was once crowned King, and in full poſſeſſion of the Realme, he caſt away his old conditions. For, when I my ſelfe ſued to him for my part of the Earle of Hertfords Lands, which his Brother Edward wrongfully detained from mee, and alſo required to haue the office of the high Conſtable-ſhip of England, as diuers of my noble Anceſtors before this time haue had, and in long diſcent continued; In this my firſt ſuite, he did not onely firſt delay me, and afterwards deny me, but gaue mee ſuch vnkinde words, as though I had neuer furthered him: all which I ſuffered patiently. But when I was informed of the death of the two young Innocents, O Lord, my heart inwardly grudged, inſomuch as I abhorred the ſight of him; I tooke my leaue of the Court, and returned to Brecknocke to you, but in my journey as I came, I had diuers imaginations how to depriue this vnnaturall Vncle. Firſt, I fantaſied, that if I liſt to take vpon mee the Crowne, now was the way made plaine, and occaſion giuen. For I well ſaw hee was diſdained of the Lords Temporall, and accurſed of the Lords Spirituall. After diuers cogitations of this matter, as I rode betweene Worceſter and Bridgenorth, I encountred with the Lady Margaret Counteſſe of Richmond, now wife to the Lord Stanley, who is the very daughter, and ſole heire to Iohn Duke of Sommerſet, my Grand-fathers elder Brother, ſo that ſhee and her ſonne Henry Earle of Richmond bee both betweene me and the gate, to enter into the Majeſty-royall, and getting of the Crowne; and when we had a little communed concerning her Sonne, and were departed, I then began to diſpute with my ſelfe, whether I were beſt to take it vpon me, by the election of the Nobilitie and Communaltie, or to take it by power. Thus ſtanding in a wauering ambiguitie, I conſidered firſt, the office, dutie, and paine of a King, which ſurely I thinke that no mortall man can juſtly and truly obſerue, except he be elected of God, as King Dauid was.

(27) But further I remembred, that if I once tooke vpon mee the Gouernance of the Realme, the Daughters of King Edward, and their Allies, being both for his ſake much beloued, and alſo for the great injurie done to them, much pittied, would neuer ceaſe to bark at the one ſide of mee. Semblably my Couſin the Earle of Richmond, his aydes and kins-folkes will ſurely attempt either to bite, or to pierce me on the other ſide, ſo that my life and rule ſhould euer hang vnquiet in doubt of death or depoſition: And if the ſaid two Linages of Yorke and Lancaſter ſhould joyne in one againſt me, then were I ſurely matched. Wherefore I haue clearely determined vtterly to relinquiſh all imaginations concerning the obtaining of the Crowne. For, as I told you, the Counteſſe of Richmond in my returne from the new-named King, meeting mee in the high way, prayed mee firſt for kindreds ſake, ſecondly, for the loue I bare to my Grand-father Duke Humfrey, who was ſworne-brother to her father, to mooue the King to be good to her ſonne Henry Earle of Richmond, and to licence him with his fauour to returne againe into England, and if it were his pleaſure ſo to doe, ſhee promiſed that the Earle her Sonne ſhould marry one of the Kings Daughters at the appointment of the King, without any thing demanded for the ſaid eſpouſals, but onely the Kings fauour, which requeſt I ſoone ouer-paſſed, and departed. But after in my lodging I called to memory more of that matter, and now am bent, that the Earle of Richmond, heire of the Houſe of Lancaſter, ſhall take to Wife Lady Elizabeth, eldeſt Daughter to King Edward, by the which marriage both the Houſes of Yorke and Lancaſter may be vnited in one.

Henry Earle of Richmond and Lady Elizabeth muſt make the vnion.

(28) When the Duke had ſaid, Biſhop Morton, who euer fauoured the Houſe of Lancaſter, was wondrous joyfull, for all his imagination tended to this effect; and leſt the Dukes courage ſhould aſſwage, or his minde alter, hee ſaid to the Duke: My Lord of Buckingham, ſith by Gods prouiſion, and your incomparable wiſdome, this noble conjunction is firſt mooued, it is neceſſary to conſider what perſons we ſhall firſt make priuy of this politique concluſion. By my troth (quoth the Duke) we will begin with my Lady of Richmond the Earles Mother, which knoweth where he is in Britaine: ſith you will begin that way (ſaid the Biſhop) I haue an old friend with the Counteſſe, called Reinald Bray, for for whom I ſhall ſend, if it be your pleaſure: ſo the Biſhop wrote for him to come to Brecknocke, who ſtraite came backe with the meſſenger, where the Duke and Biſhop declared what they had deuiſed for the preferment of the Earle of Richmond, Sonne to his Lady and Miſtreſſe: willing her firſt to compaſſe how to obtaine the good will of Queene Elizabeth, and alſo of her eldeſt daughter: and after ſecretly to ſend to her Sonne in Britaine, to declare what high honour was prepared for him, if he would ſweare to marry the Lady Elizabeth aſſoone as hee was King of the Realme. With which concluſion, Reinold Bray, with a glad heart, returned to the Counteſſe his Lady. Bray thus departed, the Biſhop told the Duke, that if he were in his Iſle of Ely, hee could make many friends to further their enterprize. The Duke knew this to bee true, but yet loth to loſe the ſocietie of ſuch a Counſellor, gaue him faire words, ſaying, he ſhould ſhortly depart well accompanied for feare of enemies: but the Biſhop ere the Dukes company were aſſembled, ſecretly diſguiſed, in a night departed and came to Ely, where hee found money and friends, and then ſailed into Flaunders, where hee did the Earle of Richmond good ſeruice.

Biſhop Morton eſcapeth from Brecknocke diſguiſed.

(29) When Reinold Bray had declared his meſſage to the Counteſſe, no maruell if ſhee were glad; wherefore ſhe deuiſed a meanes how to breake this matter to Queene Elizabeth, being then in Sanctuary at Weſtminſter, and hauing in her family a certaine Welſhman called Lewis, learned in Phyſicke, now hauing opportunitie to breake her minde vnto him, declared that the time was come, that her Sonne ſhould be joyned in marriage with Lady Elizabeth, daughter and heire to King Edward: and that King Richard ſhould out of all honour and eſtate bee dejected, and required him to goe to Queene Elizabeth not as a meſſenger, but as one that came friendly to viſit her, and as time and place ſhould ſerue to make her priuy of this deuice. This Phyſician with good diligence repayred to the Queene, and when he ſaw time conuenient, ſaid vnto her: Madam, although my imagination be very ſimple, yet for the entire affection I beare to you and to your children, I am ſo bold to vtter vnto you a ſecret conceit, which I haue compaſſed in my braine. When I remember the great loſſe which you haue ſuſtained by the death of your louing Husband, and the great ſorrow that you haue ſuffered by the cruell murder of your innocent children, I can no leſſe doe, then daily ſtudy how to bring your heart to comfort, and alſo to reuenge the quarrell of you and your children, on that cruell Tyrant King Richard. And firſt conſider what battell, and what miſchiefe haue riſen by the diſſention betweene the two Houſes, of Yorke and Lancaſter, which two Families if they may be joyned in one, I doubt not but that your line ſhall be againe reſtored, to your great joy and comfort: You know, Madam, that of the Houſe of Lancaſter, the Earle of Richmond is next of blood, and to the Houſe of Yorke your daughters now are heires. If you could deuiſe the meanes how to couple your eldeſt Daughter with the Earle of Richmond in matrimony, no doubt, but that the Vſurper ſhould ſhortly bee depoſed, and your heire againe to her right reſtored.

(30) When the Queene had heard this friendly Motion, ſhee inſtantly beſought him, that as he had beene the firſt inuenter of ſo good an enterprize, that now he would not deſiſt to follow the ſame, requiring him further, that hee would reſort to the Counteſſe of Richmond, mother to the Earle Henry, and to declare to her on the Queenes behalfe, that all the friends of King Edward her Husband, ſhould aſſiſt and take part with the Earle of Richmond her ſonne, ſo that he would take an oath, that after the Kingdome obtained, to eſpouſe the Lady Elizabeth her daughter, &c. M. Lewis ſo ſped his buſineſſe, that he made a finall end of this buſineſſe betweene the two mothers: ſo the Lady Margaret Counteſſe of Richmond, brought to a good hope of the preferment of her Sonne, made Reinold Bray chiefe ſoliciter of this conſpiracy, giuing him in charge, ſecretly to inueagle ſuch perſons of Nobilitie to joyne with her, and take her part, as he knew to be faithfull.

Queene Elizabeth readily receiueth the motion.

(31) This Reinold Bray within few daies brought to his luer Sir Giles Daubeny, Sir Iohn Cheinie, Knights, Richard Guilford, and Thomas Ramney Eſquiers, and others. In the meane while, the Counteſſe of Richmond ſent one Chriſtopher Vrſewicke, a Prieſt, into Britaine, to the Earle of Richmond her Sonne, to declare to him all the agreements betweene her and the Queene agreed:

agreed: and withall to ſhew him that the Duke of Buckingham was one of the firſt inuenters of this enterprize: ſhee likewiſe ſent Hugh Conway an Eſquire into Britaine, with a great ſum of mony, giuing him in charge to declare to the Earle, the great loue that the moſt part of the Nobilitie of the Realme bare towards him, willing him not to neglect ſo good an occaſion offered, but with all ſpeed to ſettle his minde how to returne into England, and therewithall aduiſing him to take Land in Wales. When the Earle had receiued this joyfull meſſage, he brake to the Duke of Britaine all his ſecrets, aduertiſing him that he was entred into a ſure and ſtedfaſt hope to obtaine the Crowne of England, deſiring him of helpe towards the atchieuing of his enterprize, which the Duke promiſed, and afterwards performed: whereupon the Earle ſent backe againe Hugh Conway, and Thomas Ramney to declare his comming ſhortly into England.

(32) In the meane ſeaſon the chiefe of the conſpiracy in England, began many enterprizes, which being neuer ſo priuily handled, yet knowledge thereof came to King Richard, and becauſe hee knew the Duke of Buckingham to bee the chiefe head, and aide of this combination, he thought it moſt neceſſary to plucke him from that part, and thereupon addreſſed his louing Letters vnto the Duke, requeſting him moſt earneſtly to come to the Court, whoſe graue aduice for counſell he then ſtood much in need of; with many words of kinde complements to be vttered from the mouth of the meſſenger: but the Duke miſtruſting thoſe ſweet promiſes proceeded out of a bitter intent, and knowing King Richard to ſpeake moſt faireſt when he meant fouleſt play, deſired the King of pardon, excuſing himſelfe that he was ſickly, and not well able to trauell: which excuſe the King would not admit, but ſent other Letters with checking words, commanding him without delay to repaire to his preſence: vnto which the Duke made a determinate anſwer, that hee would not come to his mortall enemy: and immediately prepared warre againſt him. Whereupon, Thomas Marqueſſe Dorſet came out of Sanctuary, and gathered a great band of men in the County of Yorke, Sir Edward Courtney and Peter his Brother, Biſhop of Exceſter, raiſed another Army in Deuonſhire and Cornwall, and in Kent, Sir Richard Guilford, and other Gentlemen raiſed a Company, and all this was done euen in one moment.

(33) King Richard rowzed from his pleaſures in progreſſe, ſent forth commiſſion to muſter his men, and with a great preparation from London marched towards Salisbury, thinking it not beſt to diſparkle his power into ſmall parts in purſuing his enemies euery way at once, and therefore omitting all others, with a great puiſſance went to ſet vpon the Duke of Buckingham, the head of the ſpring. The Duke hearing of the Kings approach, made out to meete him before hee came too farre, accompanied with a great power of wilde Welſhmen, whom hee had enforced to follow him, more by his Lordly commandement, then by liberall wages, which thing in deed was the cauſe that they fell off, and forſooke him. His march was thorow the Forreſt of Deane, intending for Gloceſter, where he meant to paſſe Seuerne, and ſo haue joyned his Army with the Courtneys, and other Weſterne men, which had he done, no doubt King Richard had beene in great jeopardie. But before he could attaine the Seuerne ſide, by force of continuall raine the Riuer roſe ſo high, that it ouer-flowed all the Country adjoyning, and was not againe bounded within his owne bankes for the ſpace of ten daies, ſo that the Duke could not get ouer, nor his Complices any wiſe come vnto him: during which time the Welſhmen lingring idle, without wages, or victuall, ſuddenly brake vp Campe, and departed; whereupon the Duke was wonderouſly perplexed, not knowing how to recouer this vnfortunate chance, and deſtitute of power to ſhew himſelfe in field, ſought to ſecure himſelfe in ſecret, till deſtiny aſſigned him a better day.

as men ſtrucke in ſudden feare ſhifted euery one for himſelfe, many of them taking Sanctuary, but the moſt of the chiefeſt tooke into Britaine, among whom were Peter Courtney, Biſhop of Exceſter, with his brother Edward Earle of Deuonſhire, Thomas Marqueſſe Dorſet, the Queenes Sonne, and his young ſonne Thomas being a Child, Edward Wooduile Knight, brother to the Queene, Iohn Lord Wells, Sir Robert Willoughby, Sir Iohn Bourchier, Sir Giles Daubeney, Sir Thomas Arundell, Sir Iohn Cheinie with his two Brethren, Sir William Barkley, Sir Richard Edgecombe, and Sir William Brandon, Edward Poinings an excellent Captaine and others.

Many fled into Britaine to Earle Henry.

(35) Richard thus farre proceeded, and no enemy ſeene, his hopes were encreaſed, and feares daily leſſe; yet being a Prince politique and vigilant, he commanded the Ports to be ſecurely kept, & knowing that Buckingham was not fled with the reſt, made Proclamation for the apprehending of that Duke, promiſing a thouſand pound to the man that could bring him forth, with pardon of his faults, to enjoy the Kings fauour, and if he were a Bond-man, preſently to be made free. Baniſter minding the preſent, and forgetting what was paſt, ſpred his lap firſt to receiue this golden ſhowre, and in hope of this gaine, made no conſcience to betray his owne Lord, who had now laid his life vpon truſt in his hands: hee therefore repayring to the Sheriffe of Shrewesbury, reuealed the Duke, who diſguiſed like a poore Countrey-man, and digging in a groue neere vnto Baniſters Houſe, was apprehended, and with a great Guard of men was brought vnto Salisbury, where King Richard then lay, and where without arraignement or judgement, vpon the ſecond of Nouember hee loſt his head: whoſe death was the leſſe lamented, for that himſelfe had beene the chiefe Inſtrument to ſet the Crowne wrongfully vpon Richards head: and yet the treachery of Baniſter was moſt ſeuerely puniſhed, as many haue obſerued, not onely in the loſſe of his reward promiſed, which he neuer had, and infamy receiued, neuer after ſhaken off; but alſo in himſelfe and children, as are thus reported; his eldeſt ſonne and heire fell mad, and dyed ſo diſtracted in a Bores Stye: his ſecond ſonne became deformed in his limmes, and fell lame; his third ſonne was drowned in a ſmall puddle of water; his eldeſt daughter was ſuddenly ſtrucke with a foule leproſie, and himſelfe being of extreme age, was arraigned and found guilty of murder, and by his Clergy ſaued his life.

(36) Another Commotion at the ſame time was in Kent, where George Browne and Iohn Gilford Knights, Fogge, Scot, Clifford, and Bonting, with fiue thouſand men attempted great matters at Graues-end, but hearing of the Duke of Buckinghams ſurprize, diſperſed themſelues for that time. But when King Richard perceiued how hee was euery where beſet, he ſent one Thomas Hutton vnto Francis Duke of Britaine, with proffers of gold to circumuent and impriſon Earle Henry, who as hee feared was too well friended in thoſe forraine parts; which thing indeede this Hutton well perceiued, and ſo to the King reported, that the Duke was nothing forward to bite at this baite: whereupon, thoſe that lately fled England, were indited of Treaſon, and other of Henries factions beheaded, whereof Sir George Browne, and Sir Roger Clifford Knights, with foure others were beheaded at London, and at Exceſter for the like cauſe dyed Sir Thomas Sentleger, who had married Lady Anne Dutcheſſe of Exceſter, King Richards owne ſiſter, with others; ſo jealous was the King of his vſurped Crowne: and that nothing ſhould bee laid to vnprouident fore-ſight, the coaſts he ſtored with Armies of men, furniſhed the Ports with ſtore of Prouiſion, and made all things ready to with-ſtand Earle Henries arriuall. Who now hauing gotten ayde of fiue thouſand Britaines, with fortie Veſſels well furniſhed, ſet ſaile from thence the twelfth of October, but was taken with ſo terrible a tempeſt, that his Fleet was diſparkled, ſome into Normandy, and ſome compelled to returne into Britaine, onely the Earles Ship with one other kept the Seas, being ſore toſſed all night, and in the morning arriued in the mouth of Poole in the County of Dorſet, where he might behold the Shore full of men ſhining in armour, to his great amazement: whereupon he ſent out his Ship-boat to know whether they were friends or enemies; their anſwer was, that they were thither appointed by the Duke of Buckingham, to attend the comming of the Earle of Richmond, to conduct him in ſafetie to the Duke, who lay encamped not farre off, that ſo joyning their forces, Lord Henry thus croſſed by Sea, had preſent newes of Buckinghams ſurprize and death, with the flight of the Nobles eſcaped from Richard: who meeting with Richmond in Britaine, fell forthwith into Councell: where firſt it was determined, that Earle Henry ſhould take his Oath to eſpouſe the Lady Elizabeth, eldeſt Daughter vnto King Edward, and the immediate heire to the Crowne, which he ſolemnely did in the Church at Rhedon: and they for their parts ſware vnto him fealtie, doing him homage with no leſſe reſpect then vnto their ſole and crowned King.

(39) His feares nothing leſſened, but rather daily increaſed, he attempted once more to ſtop the Currant which led to the Spring; to which end hee ſent his Ambaſſadours loaden with Gold, and many gay promiſes vnto Francis Duke of Britaine, offering to giue him all Richmonds Lands, and yeerely reuenues, if he would either ſend the ſaid Earle into England, or commit him there vnto priſon. Theſe comming to the Dukes Court, could haue no communication with him, he lying extremely ſicke, and his wits too weake to entertaine diſcourſe. Whereupon Peter Landoſe his Treaſurer, a man pregnant in wit, and of great authoritie, tooke the motion in hand, vnto whom the Engliſh Ambaſſadors promiſed all the Earles Reuenewes, if he could bring King Richards requeſt to paſſe. He greedy of gaine, and being in place to doe what he would, promiſed to effect it, conditionally that King Richard would make good his offer. Thus whileſt meſſengers poſted betwixt Peter and Richard, Iohn Biſhop of Ely being then in Flaunders, was certified by Chriſtopher Vrſwicke of all the circumſtances of this purpoſe: whereupon the Biſhop with all poſſible haſte, ſent the ſame intelligence the ſame day, and by the ſame man, vnto Earle Henry in Britaine, willing him to ſhift himſelfe and followers, into France: who forthwith ſent Vrſwicke vnto King Charles, to haue his licence that he might with his good liking come into his dominions, which being obtained, hee cauſed the other Lords, vnder pretence to viſit the ſicke Duke, Offers made to the Duke of Britaine.

King Charles granteth his ſafe-conduct to Henry.

Duke, to escape into Anjou, and two daies after changing his apparell with his seruant, waited vpon him as vpon his Master, and posted thence into France: whose escape when the Treasurer heard of, hee sent after to apprehend him, and that in such haste, as at his entrance into the French dominions they were hard at his heeles.

Earle Henry hardly escaped.

(40) This sudden flight of the Earle and of the other English Lords, the Duke of Britaine (being somewhat recouered of his dangerous sicknes) tooke very grieuously, imputing it a great dishonour vnto himself, to suffer the least suspect of breach betwixt him and the Earle, and therfore sore offended at Landois whom he suspected to be deepe in the deed, he sent for Edward Wooduile and Edward Pownings, two English Esquires, vnto whom he deliuered a summe of money which he had promised to Earle Henry, with a conuoy vnto all the rest of the English, to depart Vannes, bearing all their charges till they came to their Earle in France. Neither was K. Charles backward to forward Earle Richmond against the Tyrant and Vsurper of the English Crowne. And the more to joy Henry, Iohn Earle of Oxford, imprisoned by Kng Edward the fourth in the Castle of Hammes; with Captaine Blunt his Keeper, and Sir Iohn Forteſcue Porter of Callis, came vnto Earle Henry to take their fortunes in following of his. This Earle of Oxford, as we haue seene, was a continuall Ayder of King Henry the sixt, against his opposite King Edward, and had done many seruices in the Lancastrians cause, till destiny had cast downe the hopes of their side. Him therefore Earle Henry made his chiefe Councellor for warre, as for expetience, policy, valour, and faith in that businesse, no man was more meete. Whose prowesse further appeared, when Earle Henry wan the wreath of Bosworth-field, where, in the Front of that Battell, hee led the band of Archers, and euer after liued in great fauour with this King Henry the Seuenth, and in great honour dyed the fourth yeere of King Henry the eighth. In the like trust for Counsell and fauour with these Kings, was Richard Fox Doctor of Diuinitie, who being then a student in Paris, was found by Earle Richmond to be the chiefest man for imployment in his French businesse, which hee so prudently and faithfully effected, as the Earle being King, acknowledging him one of his principall aduācers, made him of his Priuy-Councell, Lord Priuy-Seale, and raised him to very great places in Church and Common-wealth; and lastly, to testifie in what deare esteeme hee held him, made him God-father to his son Prince Henry, who was after King of England, with whom in great reuerence he liued a long time, euen till his eye-sight fayled through age, and did many workes of Pietie, whereof Corpus Christi Colledge in Oxford, is and shall be for euer a Noble witnesse; and his honourable care of reuerend Antiquitie, in preseruing the bones of many Saxon Kings, and by him bestowed in faire Monuments in the Cathedrall Church of Wincheſter, shal neuer want due celebration amongst all that honour antiquitie and glorious studies. But from these worthy Subjects, wee returne againe to their Soueraigne King Henry.

(41) Whose beginnings thus forwarded by the Duke of Britaine and the French King, drew many English into France, and filled the heart of the Vsurper with an extreme feare; therefore to accomplish by policy, what was doubtfull by Armes, he sought to baite his hooke yet another way. The Title hee knew stood with the Daughters of King Edward (his Sonnes being murdered) and among them, to Lady Elizabeth the eldest, whose marriage he well saw must bring Henry the Crowne. But that once diuerted, his streame of it selfe could beare no great float, nor bring any inundation into the Land, and therefore Queene Elizabeth in Sanctuary must be Courted, that her Daughters might come to Court, and there be regarded according to their degrees. This so cunningly was carryed, by men that could carry themselues to fit womens affections, that the King was purged of the murther of her Sonnes; shee made to beleeue that her selfe was respected a Dowager Queene, and Sister in law to the present King; and that himselfe had a Prince and many Princely Peeres most fit matches for those Princes her Daughters; that her Sonne Thomas Marquesse Dorset, whilest hee followed the runnaway Henry, left his honourable preferments intended to him-ward; and lastly, requiring a reconciliation with the Queene, forgaue all injuries vttered against him out of her womanish passions, with a most willing heart: and indeed theſe meſſengers were ſuch Craftsmaſters, as they brought Queene Elizabeth into a fooles-Paradiſe, and made her beleeue that their words were his heart. Whereupon forgetting all things paſſed before, as the murther of her ſons, the diſhonour of her husband, the baſtardy of their Children, and her owne ſcandal for Sorcery: nor remembring the faithfull promiſe ſhe made to Lady Margaret Earle Henries mother, ſhee deliuered her fiue Daughters, as Lambes committed to the rauening Wolfe, in which act of hers is ſeene the weakneſſe of that Sexe, & the ambition whereunto by nature they are inclined; for preſently vpon the deliuery of her Daughters, ſhee ſent priuily for the Lord Marqueſſe Dorſet her Son, then reſiding in Paris, willing him to deſiſt frō the Earles faction, & come vnto K. Richard, who promiſed him preferm̄et, & that her ſelf & daughters were in high fauour, all injuries on both parts forgiuen and forgotten.

(42) This entrance made vnto the Tragedy intended, to furniſh the Stage, and finiſh the Scene of her owne life; the next Actor muſt be Queene Anne, who onely now ſtood in the Tyrants way, her death hee meant ſhould giue life to his intruded Regencie, and adde a further Claime and ſtrength to the poſſeſſion which he already had, by matching with his Neece, the next heire vnto the Crowne, the Lady Elizabeth; the let onely reſting, that himſelfe had a Wife; her death therefore muſt immediately be ſought, yet ſo, as the honourable repute of his name ſhould no wayes be impeached, euer carrying himſelfe in outward ſemblance for a good religious honeſt man, and much deſirous that his people ſhould account him ſo. Firſt therefore hee began to lament the barrenneſſe of his Wiues wombe, and the great dangers that the Realm̄e was like to ſuſtaine, if himſelfe ſhould dye Iſſueleſſe, complaining often thereof vnto his Nobilitie, but moſt eſpecially vnto * Archbiſhop Rotheram lately releaſed out of priſon, whereby the Prelate conjectured, Queene Anne had not long to liue. Then refrained he her bed, vnder pretext of Penancy, taking her defect as a ſcourge for his owne ſinnes, which day and night he fought to expiate by prayers: His next policy was, how her death might be wrought with the leaſt ſuſpect of wrong, and how taken when ſhee was gone: Therefore as an aſſay to the Peoples taſte, he cauſed it to be giuen forth that Queene Anne was dead, which was ſo commonly diuulged, that the rumour thereof came to her owne eare, and ſhe hauing had ſufficient experience of her Husbands proceedings, feared this to be one of his plots, miſtruſting (and not without cauſe) that her life was in danger: whereupon all diſmaid, with a lamentable countenance, ſhe came to the King, and with weeping teares demanded, what offence ſhe had done, that the ſentence of death was giuen againſt her already? Richard made it ſtrange to ſee her ſo perplext, and with louing words, and ſmiling ſemblance, bade her liue to ſcandalize report, and to thinke that many yeeres were yet added to her life: but whether in conceit for ſorrow, or of poyſon, I cannot ſay, ſhee dyed ſhortly after, and was ſolemnely buried in the Abbey of Weſtminſter.

(43) The King thus deliuered from the bands of Matrimony, and now a Widower, at libertie to chooſe where he would, caſt glances of loue towards the Lady Elizabeth his owne Brothers daughter, and began to court her for his ſecond Queene; but the thing was ſo offenſiue to the Law of nature, and ſo directly againſt the Law of God, as all men abhorred the motion, and moſt of all the Maiden her ſelfe; which Richard perceiuing, he forbare ouer earneſt purſuite, to gaine his time and to fit occaſions; but moſt eſpecially, hauing no leaſure to woo, his Subjects on all ſides daily reuolting, and his Nobles more & more had in ſuſpect; among whom one was Lord Thomas Stanley Earle of Darby, who had married Lady Margaret Counteſſe of Richmond, Earle Henries owne Mother: him therefore hee moſt miſtruſted, and before he would admit his departure from Court, commanded him to leaue his Sonne and heire George Stanley, the L. Strange, for his hoſtage, which he did, though it little auailed to binde Darbies affection vnto his ſide.

(44) In this while King Richard hearing that Oxford had eſcaped out of the Caſtle of Hammes, and that he, with the Captaine thereof Iames Blunt, were fled into France, and joyned with Richmond; thought it high time to quench the ſparks in thoſe parts, before they ſhould riſe to a higher flame; and therefore hee appointed (which was preſently accompliſhed) the Garriſon at Callis to ſtrait the ſaid Caſtle with a hard ſiege, being well well assured that many well-willers to the Earles proceedings lay there harboured, who vpon the least aduantage would be ready to play. But Henry not vnmindfull of his distressed friends, nor Oxford forgetting his kinde Oastesse Captaine Blunts wife, made vnto the Peece, and on the sudden put Thomas Brandon, with thirty approued Souldiers into the Castle, who from the walls plaied vpon the besiegers, whiles Oxford annoyed them vpon their backes, so that presently they offered, and came to a composition, which was, that they within should safely depart, but the Castle to remaine in subiection to the King.

(45) Hammes thus restored, in danger to be lost, & nothing had thence besides a woman and a few suspected persons, King Richard thought himselfe now sure of all, and fearing no inuasion at home, imagined that much harme could not be done abroad: for Henry in France (as he thought) found very few friends, and was fully perswaded that the French Kings assistance stood more of words then in deedes. And indeed some occasion of such suspition was ministred; for King Charles but young, and the Princes at variance, Earle Henry was enforced to make suite vnto them man by man. Besides, Thomas Marquesse Dorset, sent for by his Mother the Queene, suddenly in the night made an escape from Paris, with purpose for England, which strooke great feare among Earle Henries part, chiefly for that all their Counsels were knowne vnto the Marquesse, which if he should reueale, their designes were made desperate. To preuent which, he was posted after, and brought backe againe, though much against his will. These things considered, King Richard, to lessen his great charges, discharged his Nauy at seas, commanding the Welsh to watch the shoare, Beacons to be built, and armour to be ready at euery call; then giuing his affections leaue to entertaine more security, saw not the sword that hung ouer his head.

(46) But Earle Henry deliuered from the feare of the Marquesse, thought it not best to prolong time, lest others vpon like purposes should bewray his intents; and thereupon obtayning a small aide of the French, with a certaine summe of money, for which the Lord Marquesse (whom he much mistrusted) and Sir Iohn Bourchier were left in pledge, he set forward to Roan, and prepared his shipping in the mouth of Seyn: whither tidings was brought him of Queene Annes death, and that King Richard purposed to marry Lady Elizabeth: a feare indeed farre exceeding the former, she being the Princesse by whom he must claime, whereupon much distemperature arose, euery mans braine working vpon the newes. But after much consultation, it was held the best to make ouer into England, to interpose the proceedings ere the match was fully made: whereupon Earle Richmond with two thousand men onely, and a small number of ships, set saile from Harfleut the fifteenth of August, and the seuenth day following arriued at Milford-Hauen in Wales, where taking Land, he came vnto Dale, and thence the next day marched to Hereford west, ten miles into the Maine, from thence he marched to Cardigan, where he had newes that the Countrey was fore-laid against him: but finding that vntrue, he made still forward, beating downe such Holds as held against him: then sending secretly to Lady Margaret his Mother, to the Lord Stanley, Talbot, and others, signified vnto them, he meant to passe Seuerne at Shrewesburie, and thence to march directly towards London. In his way to Shrewesburie, there met him Sir Rice ap Thomas, a man of great command in Wales, with a number of men to side in his quarrell, which Henry afterwards requited in making this his first Ayder the Gouernour of Wales.

Then passed he forward to Stafford, and had conference there with Sir William Stanley; and proceeding forward, was honourably receiued into the Citie Lichfield, where Thomas Earle of Darby, with fiue thousand armed men, had beene some few dayes before, but hearing of Earle Henries approach, remoued to Anderson, to auoid suspition of the jealous King that kept his sonne Hostage for his further truth.

principall men, in whom he conceiued no little truſt: yet leſt this new riſen Spring might gather in more heads, he ſent to Iohn Duke of Norfolke, Henry Earle of Northumberland, and Thomas Earle of Surrey, willing them with a ſelected power to repreſſe the inſolency of this head-ſtrong Earle: Moreouer, hee ſent for Sir Robert Brakenburie Lieutenant of the Tower, Sir Thomas Bourchier, and Sir Walter Hungerford, Knights, all of them in great iealouſie & miſtruſt; commanding them with their forces to come and attend vpon his perſon, which accordingly they ſet forward to doe: meane while ſending his Spials to know the way Henry went, had intelligence that he was paſt Shrewesbury, without any impeachment: whereat ſtorming in choler, and curſing their vntruths whom he had put in truſt, craued vengeance from heauen, and inſtantly intended to reuenge it himſelfe; then hauing notice the Earle was at Lichfield, and his partie increaſed by dayly repaire, incontinently hee marſhalled his Followers, and like a valiant Captaine and politike Leader, ſet forward his battels fiue & fiue in a ranke. In the middeſt of his troups he beſtowed the carriages belonging to his army; and himſelfe mounted vpon a white Courſer, enuironed with his gard, followed by his footmen, and the wings of his horſemen ranged on euery ſide, with a frowning ſterne countenance, but yet in great pompe, entred the towne of Leiceſter after the Sun was ſet, being full of indignation, and ſwelling in anger, which ſomewhat hee aſſwaged with threats of reuenge.

49 Earle Richmond from Lichfield departed from Tamworth, and in the way met Sir Thomas Bourchier, and Sir Walter Hungerford going towards the King, who vpon this vnlooked for occaſion, and knowing themſelues in what ſuſpition they ſtood, ſecretly left the companie of their captain Brakenbury the night following, and wandring in waies vnknowne, with much ado got ſafely vnto the Earles companies.

Sir Thomas and Sir Walter Hungerford turne to Earle Henry.

50 In the like danger, through darknes of night, Henry himſelf chanced to come; for albeit he was a man both valiant & forward, and by his own wiſdome could manage his weightieſt affaires; Yet now hauing notice that King Richard with a ſtrong army was neere, and that his father in law, the Lord Stanley, ſtood as a Neuter, he was ſtrook deep in his dumps, and with twenty light Horſe-men lingering behinde, ſo ſeriouſly muſing what was to be done, as laſtly, he loſt the ſight of his Hoſte, and by the darkeneſſe of night miſſed his way; neither durſt he for the Kings Scout-watch demand direction to Tamworth, but lay in a ſmall Village about three miles diſtant, to his no little griefe, and his whole Armies great amazement; the one prognoſticating it to be a preſage of an ill beginning, and the other doubting ſome detriment of their Lord: but in the dawning of the next morning (conducted by good fortune) he came to his Hoſte, excuſing that his abſence was to haue conference with his ſecret friends; and then priuily departing to the Lord Stanley, had conference with him, and was put in good comfort.

(51) But contrariwiſe, King Richard was wrapped and perplexed with feare, not onely with the departure of Sir Iohn Sauage, Sir Brian Sanford, and Sir Simon Digby, in whom hee had repoſed great truſt, but alſo in the dreadfull dreames which nightly he ſuffred, wherin to his ſeeming, terrible Diuels ſo pulled and haled him, as by no meanes he could take any reſt; which fearefull imaginations ſtrucke ſo deepe an impreſſion vnto his heart, that the ſignes thereof appeared in his countenance, howſoeuer he ſought to put them off in ſhew.

King Richard terrified with dreadfull dreames.

(52) But being determined to put himſelfe to the triall of battell, or elſe, (and that rather) enforced by diuine Iuſtice to pull the reuenging hand of heauen againſt him, in the morning he marched toward the enemy, and vpon a faire plaine called Redmore, neere vnto Boſworth, about ſeuen miles Weſt from Leiceſter, he pitched downe his Tents, and thence ſent a Purſeuant to the Lord Stanley, commanding him to aduance forward with his Company, and to come to his Preſence, which if he refuſed to doe, he ſware by Chriſts paſſion, his ſonnes head ſhould off before that he dyned. The Lord Stanley anſwered the Purſeuant, that if the King did ſo, hee had more ſonnes aliue; but to come to the King hee was not at that time determined. This anſwer declared, King Richard commanded the Lord Strange incontinent to be beheaded, at the very ſeaſon, when the two Armies came in ſight each of others: but his Councellors told him, that the time was now to fight, and not to execute, which might better bee

The order of King Richards battell.

(53) But now the time and houre of Battell being come, he drew out his Army vpon the Plaine, whose order for fight he thus placed: The Foreward he ordered of a maruellous length, to strike the more terror in the beholders hearts, in whose Fore-front he placed his Archers, as a Bulwarke to defend the rest, the leading whereof was committed to Iohn Duke of Norfolke, with whom was Thomas Earle of Surrey, his Sonne: his owne Battallion was furnished with his best approoued men of warre, hauing Horse-men for wings on both sides of his battell: and being thus ordered for their further incouragement, King Richard mounted in place to be heard, thus said to his Souldiers:

(55) Earle Richmond then seeing King Richard thus embattelled, sent to the L. Stanley, who stood houering aloofe off, to come help him to order his fight, whose answer was, that Henry should doe it himselfe, & that he would come to him when hee saw time conuenient; which struck the Earle into a great dumpe: but now hauing no time for delay, necessitie compelled him to order his men. The Fore-ward he made single, according to his small number of souldiers, and in the Front placed his Archers, ouer whom Iohn Earle of Oxford was Captaine, the right wing was led by Sr. Gilbert Talbot; and the left assigned to Sr. Iohn Sauage: Earle Henry himself with his Vncle Iasper Earle of Pembrooke gouerned the Main-Battell, better repleniſhed with Horse then foot, whose whole number cōsisted hardly of 5000. the Kings doubling the number, and more. The Battels thus ordered, Earle Henry armed at all Peeces sauing his Helmet, rode from ranke to ranke, & from wing to wing, incouraging his men, and the more to encrease their hot spirits, mounted vpon a little banke, the better to be seene and heard, these words he vttered in all their hearing.

Henry Earle of Richmonds Oration.

"(56) If euer God gaue victory to a "just quarell, if euer he aided war for the "tuition of a Kingdome or Country, or "euer succoured thē that fought for the "reliefe of poore Innocents oppressed "by tyranny, then no doubt, my friends "and fellow Souldiers, but that this day "he will giue vs a triumphant Victory. "For if we consider for what, & against "whom we fight, we may not doubt but "that God himself wil fight for vs. The "thing which we are here ready to try "by sword, is the liberty of the Land "from vnder the vsurpation & yoke of "a Tyrant; and hee, against whom we "draw sword, is the Monster (for I may "not call him man) which feareth nei"ther God, Lawes, Iustice, nor Humanitie; "an homicide, a murderer of his owne "kindred, a destroyer of the Nobilitie, "a Mawle to his Subiects, and a Fire"brand to the whole Kingdome, whom "just vengeance craueth to haue quen"ched: and consider, I pray you, who be "of his band, euen such as by murder "and vntruth to their kinne and Coun"trey, haue got wrongfull possession of "our rightfull inheritance, letting your "wiues weepe, and Orphanes wander, "to seeke their liuelyhood where they "can get it, whose teares I doubt not "cry in the eares of the Lord, who will "punish these Malefactors either with "pricke of conscience cowardly to flye, "or deliuer themselues into our hands "without Battell: Consider further, I "pray you, that in yonder great Battell "are men brought more for feare then "for loue, by force compelled, and not "willingly assembled; persons that de"sire more the destruction, then the life "of their Captaine, and finally a mul"titude, whereof the most part be our "friends, and the least part his that leads "them; and surely it stands in suspence, "whether the malice of the Souldiers "towards their Generall, or his feare "conceiued against them, be the greater; "for this is a rule infallible, that as il men "daily

"daily couet to deſtroy the good, ſo God "appointeth the good men to confound "the ill, and if it be true that Clerkes "preach, that the one is to be hated, and "the other beloued, who then can ſpare "yonder tyrant Richard Duke of Glou-"ceſter, vntruely calling himſelfe King, "that hath broken both the Lawes of "God and Man, in the blood of his bro-"ther, the murther of his Nephews, the "death of his Wife, the ſlander of his "owne Mother, and the baſtardizing of "his brethren: If you haue not heard, yet "I haue read that Tarquin the proud, "for the rape of Lucretia, loſt the King-"dome of Rome: yet was not his fact ſo "deteſtable as Neroes, who ſlew his own "Mother, to behold the place of his con-"ception: but yonder Vſurper is both "theſe perſons in one; a Nero in murther "of his young Nephewes, and in defa-"ming the wombe of his owne concep-"tion: and a Tarquine, intending to de-"file, and carnally to know his owne "Neece, vnder pretext of holy Matri-"mony, which Lady you are witneſſe I "haue ſworne ſhall be my wife. This is "the quarrell for which we are here this "day aſſembled, & for whoſe equity we "craue God to be Iudge: a good begin-"ning of his Protection we haue alrea-"dy ſeen, in eſcaping the treaſons laid for "vs in Britain, the dangers of Seas, & our "ſafe arriuage vnto this place, not hun-"ted by any, but rather our ſelues hun-"ting after that furious Bore; who this "day, and in this place, is ſo intangled in "his owne toyle, as his crooked tuskes "ſhall not be able to gnaw the cords of "his ſnare aſunder, nor himſelfe haue "power to free himſelfe from his purſu-"ers, whoſe Iauelines (I doubt not) ſhall "bee dyed in the blood of this filthy "Swine, & ſhal well rid the world of an "vgly hog'd-backed Monſter: which "thing to accompliſh, let vs remember, "that victory is not gotte by multitude, "but by manhood, but the ſmaller num-"ber we be, the greater is our glory if we "vanquiſh; if vanquiſhed, fretting time "ſhall neuer conſume our memory, that "died to free our ſelues and Nation, "from the oppreſſion of an vſurping Ty-"rant; and thus I aſſure you, that for ſo "iuſt a cauſe you ſhall finde me this day "rather a dead Carrion vpon the cold "ground, then a Carpet-priſoner kept a-"liue for reproch. Aduance therfore for-"ward like true-hearted Engliſhmen, diſ-"play your Banner in defence of your "Countrey, get the day and be Conque-"rours, loſe the Battell and be villaines; "God and Saint George giue vs a happy "ſucceſſe. Which no ſooner was ſaid but that the Souldiers buckled their Helms, the Archers ſtript vp their ſleeues, bent their Bowes, and fruſhed their feathers, attentiuely liſtening when Trumpet ſhould giue the ſound of Battell.

The readineſſe of Earle Henries Souldiers.

(57) Betwixt both the Armies there lay a great Mariſh, which Earle Henry left vpon his right hand, with purpoſe to haue that for a defence, as alſo the Sun at his backe, & face of the enemy: which King Richard perceiuing, with ſound of Trumpet, and ſhout of his Army, paſſed the Mariſh, when the Bow-men on both ſides let freely flie their arrowes, the reſt comming to encounter with ſtrokes: but the Earle of Oxford fearing to be en-compaſſed by the enemy, commanded euery of his rankes to keepe within ten foote of his Standard; which being ac-compliſhed, and their fight a while ſtay-ed, their oppoſites miſtruſting ſome fraud or deceit, ceaſed likewiſe from theirs, many of them willing enough ſo to doe; notwithſtanding, immediately a cruell battell was againe begun, and manfully continued vpon either part: Till laſtly, King Richard hauing intelligence that the Earle of Richmond was but ſlenderly accompanied with men of Armes, and them alſo buſied in their owne guardes, meant by his incounter to finiſh the day, as the onely man vpon whom ſtood al the hope of his enemies ſucceſſe; and therfore hauing the markes of Earle Henry, made from the range of his owne Battell, and vpon the ſpurre with the Speare in his Reſt, ranne violently to-wards him in a furious ſpleene; in which rage, at the firſt brunt, he bare-down and ouerthrew the Earles Standard, and ſlew Sir William Brandon the bearer thereof; next, matching with Sir Iohn Cheiney, a man of great might, manfully threw him to the ground, thereby making an open paſſage by dint of ſword vnto the Earle himſelfe: Richmond beholding the high valour of Richard, moſt Lyon-like coped with this cruel Bore, & held him (maugre his tuskes) at his ſword point; betwixt whom the fight was ſo deſperate, that Henries company were ſtrucke in great deſpaire: at which very inſtant, Sir Willi-am Stanley came in with 3000. tall freſh Souldiers, who entred the Battell with ſuch courage and valour, as they bare down all before them where they went; whereat whereat the Kings ſide began to faint,& to giue ouer fight; but the more reſolute a while maintaining their ground, and now miſtruſting treaſon among themſelues,turned their backes and ran away, whereby King Richard preſently perceiued the downfall of his ill-raiſed glory, and the full period of his ſhort raigne: and all hope of reſiſtance now paſt, a ſwift horſe was brought to eſcape the field, with comforts that another day might ſet the victory on his ſide: but with a mind vnmatchable in hatred againſt Henry,or rather to haue his death regiſtred in fames honorable role,whoſe life had been blotted with the pen of divulged infamy, he haſtily clozed his Helmet, ſaying, that, that day ſhould make an end of all battels, or elſe in this now in trying, he would finiſh his life: which laſt was preſently performed;for thruſting into the middeſt of his enemies, and there valiantly fighting among the thickeſt,he obtained more honour in this his two houres fight,then he had gained by all the actions of his whole life.

(58) There dyed that day with him Iohn Duke of Norfolke, Walter Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe Knight, Sir Robert Brakenburie Lieutenant of the Tower, and not many Gentlemen more. Sir William Catesby one of King Richards chiefe Councellors,with two others,were taken,and two dayes after beheaded at Leiceſter; among them that eſcaped, were Francis Viſcount Louell, Humfrey and Thomas Stafford Brethren, which three tooke Sanctuary at Saint Iohns in Glouceſter. Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey, though he ſubmitted himſelfe vnto Henry, yet was he committed to the Tower, and therein a long time remained. Vpon Earle Henries part onely tenne men were ſlaine, as Sir Gilbert Talbot wrote the newes from the field, whereof for note Sir William Brandon was the beſt: in all, to the number of foure thouſand men. This battell was fought the two and twentieth of Auguſt, and yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 1485. in the field Redmore, neere vnto Boſworth, in the County of Leiceſter; after which, Earle Henry gaue thankes vnto God, and commending his Souldiers, with ſufferance for them to take the ſpoyles of the field, dubbed many of them Knights; which his doings were ſo acceptable to the whole Army, as with great applauſe they all cryed King Henry, King Henry;

King Henry (for from henceforth ſo was hee called) for their valiant ſeruice done in this battell, knighted in the field Sir Gilbert Talbot, Sir Iohn Mortimer, Sir William Willoughby, Sir Rice ap Thomas, Sir Robert Points, Sir Humfrey Stanly, Sir Iohn Turbaruile, Sir Hugh Perſhall, Sir *R. (59) The ſlaine body of the vſurping Tyrant,all tugged,and torne,naked, and not ſo much as a clout left to couer his ſhame, was truſſed behind Blanch Seint-Leger (or White-Bore, a Purſeuant at Armes,) like a Hogge or Calfe,his head and armes hanging on the one ſide of the horſe,and his legges on the other,and all be-ſprinkled with mire and bloud, was ſo brought into Leiceſter, and there for a miſerable ſpectacle, the ſpace of two dayes lay naked and vnburied, his remembrance being as odious to all,as his perſon deformed, and lothſome to be looked vpon: for whoſe further deſpite, the white Bore his cognizance was torne downe from euery ſigne, that his monument might periſh, as did the moneyes of Caligula, which were all melted by the decree of the Senate:Laſtly,his body without all funerall Solemnity, was buried in the Gray-Friers Church of that City. But King Henry his Succeſſor, of a princely diſpoſition, cauſed afterward his Tombe to be made with a picture of Alablaſter, repreſenting his perſon, and to be ſet vp in the ſame Church; which at the ſuppreſſion of that Monaſtery was pulled downe,and vtterly defaced; ſince when his graue ouer growne with nettles and weeds, is very obſcure, and not to be found. Onely the ſtone cheſt wherein his corps lay, is now made a drinking trough for Horſes at a common Inne, and retaineth the onely memory of this Monarchs greatneſſe. But his body (as tradition hath deliuered) was borne out of the City, and contemptuouſly beſtowed vnder the end of Bow-Bridge, which giueth paſſage ouer a branch of Stowre vpon the Weſt ſide of the Towne. Dead he is, and with his death ended the factions a long time continued betwixt the Families of Lancaſter and Yorke; in whoſe bandings, to bring, ſet, and keepe the Crowne on their heads, eight or nine bloody ſet battels had beene fought, and no leſſe then foureſcore perſons of the blood-royall ſlaine, as Philip Comines the French Writer ſaith; many of them being well knowne to himſelfe: after which ſtormes, and this Tyrants death, a bleſſed vnion enſued, by ioyning thoſe Houſes in Henry of Lancaſter, and Elizabeth of Yorke.

When hee ſtood muſing (as he would doe oft) his vſe was, to bite and chaw the nether lip, his hand euer on his dagger, which euer hee would chop vp and downe in the ſheath, but neuer draw it fully out. Pregnant in wit he was, wily to faine, apt to diſſemble, and haughtie of ſtomacke, an expert Souldier, and a better King then a man. He founded a Colledge at Middleham beyond Yorke, and a Collegiat Chauntery in London, neere vnto the Tower, called Our Lady of Barking; hee endowed the Queenes Colledge in Cambridge with fiue hundred Markes of yeerely reuenew; and diſforreſted the great Field of Wichwood, which King Edwards his Brother had incloſed for his game: hee Raigned two yeeres, two moneths, and one day, and was burled, as we haue ſaid.

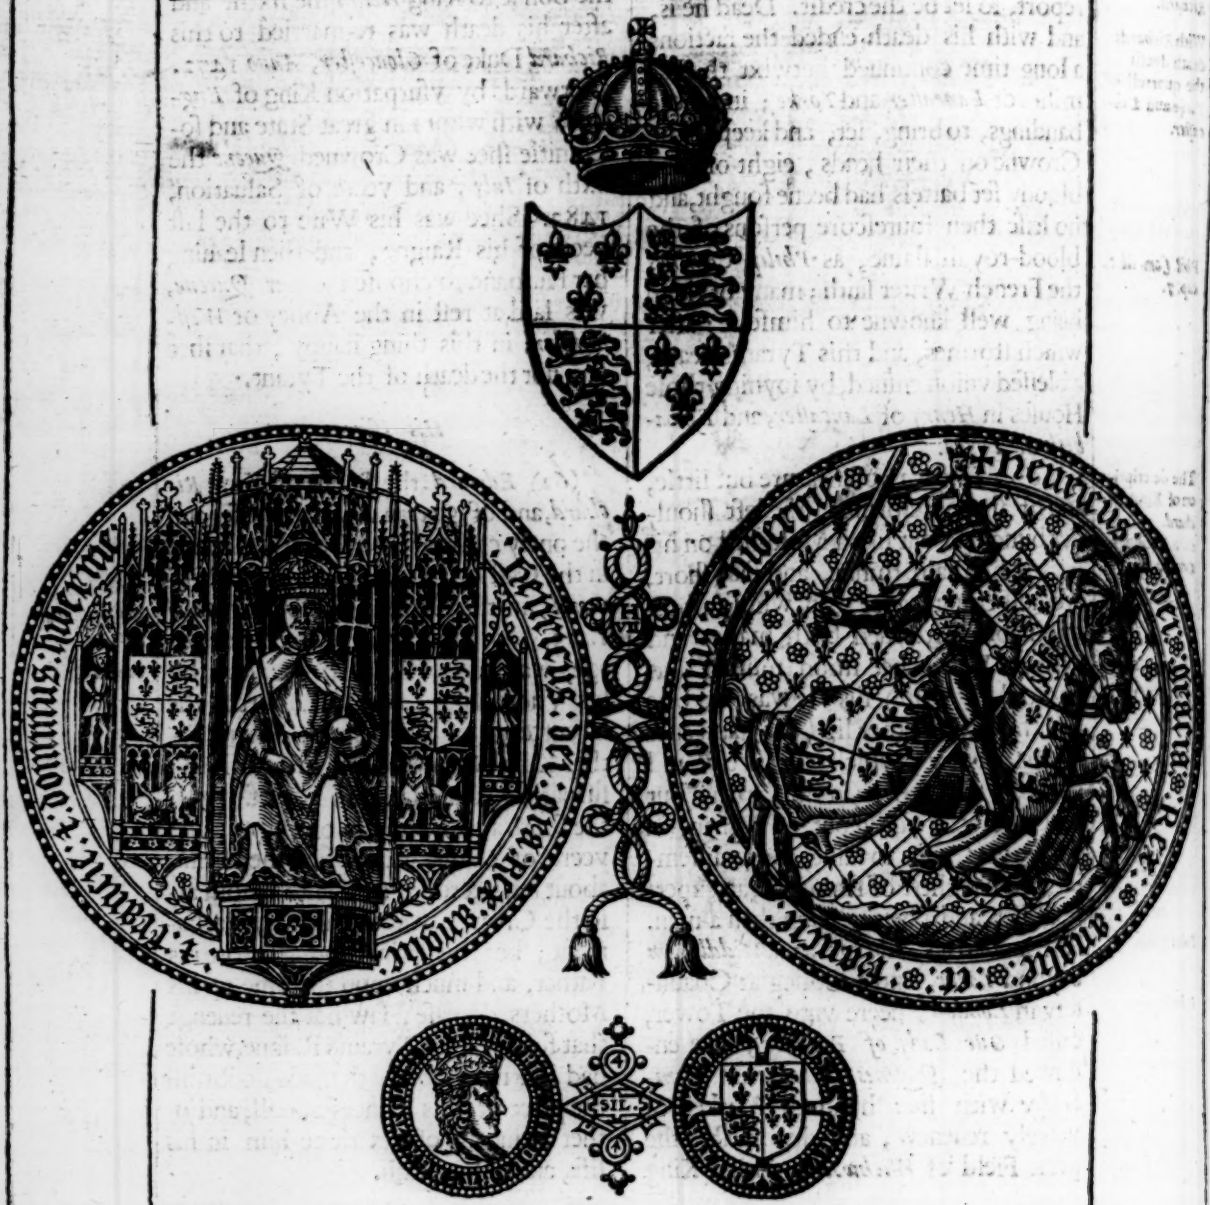
HENRY

Henry VII.

HENRY THE SEVENTH, KING OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE, AND LORD OF IRELAND, THE FIFTIE SEVENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH, HIS RAIGNE, ACTES, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 57



CHAPTER XX.

An. Dom. 1485. Auguſt. 22. The date of his Raignes commencement.

HENRY of that name the Seuenth, hauing by ſuch mixt meanes of valour and practice as are already deſcribed, obtained the poſſeſſion of Englands Crowne, wee muſt now preſent vnto you his actions in the perſon and ſtate of a King, maintained by him with like mixture of courage and skill as it was atchieued, to the verification of that rule; That things are kept by the ſame Arts whereby they were gained. In deſcribing whereof, wee meane nothing leſſe, then for humoring the vaine admirers of phraſe and conceit, conceit, to mount vp into Panegyricall flouriſhes, in honour of the man, though his excellent vertues would worthily beare, if not duely alſo exact them: yet may wee not omit to obſerue, that as in his attaining to the Crowne, there was (through diuine prouidence) a concurring diſpoſition of all important Circumſtances, without which his attempt might haue prooued diſaſterous; ſo he, hauing now poſſeſſed the Soueraigne power, and maſtered the State in the maine points, eaſily made circumſtances waite vpon his wiſedome, and to take their forme from his directions: Of the firſt kinde, wherein his felicitie deſerues to be celebrated, were theſe: That hee by the Male-Line a meere Stranger to both the Royall Houſes, as deſcended from the Welſh and French, and by the Female ſpringing out of ſuch a Family of Lancaſter (the Beaufords) as by the ſame Law which enabled it to inherit in ordinary eſtates, was made incapable of ſucceſſion in the Regalitie, ſhould ſo ſafely be conuayed away into forraine parts, there to continue an Head of expectation & reuolt, during the inteſtine troubles and dangers, to him ineuitable here at home. Secondly, that the Realme of England ſhould be ſo auerted from Richard, (though a very honourable, wiſe, juſt and neceſſary Prince, after he was ſomewhat ſettled) as for his ſake, to neglect (in a ſort) ſo many naturall heires of the Houſe of Yorke, ſome of them in right preceding Richard; ſuch were the children of Edward the fourth, and George Duke of Clarence, Richards elder Brethren, and all of them juſt barres to the Earle of Richmond, who ſcarce had any thing of a legall title, or of a warrantable intention; but his purpoſe to remooue an Vſurper, and marry the Lady Elizabeth, the rightfull Inheritrice. Thirdly, a long and fatall * ſlackneſſe of Richard in his War-like preparations, through the meere contempt of his enemy the Earle, which was the cauſe, that both he landed ſecurely, and Richard was driuen to fight in a manner with tumultuary, rather then trained forces. And finally, that a principall, potent, noble, and yet a deepely ſuſpected Conſpirator, (as being Father in law to the Earle) ſhould haue charge, vnder Richard, ouer a chiefe portion of his Army, at the very inſtant of joyning battell.

Generall obſeruations concerning this Princes whole courſe.

Concurrence of furtherances to King Henries deſignes.

* Fabian ſaith, Richard fearing little, prouided little defence.

(2) Theſe conſiderations (among many other) had in them ſuch an aptitude to his deſigne, as no humane wit could faſhion, and without the which a man of equall ſtarres and parts to Henry, or Henry himſelfe, might in vaine haue beene wiſe, in vaine induſtrious and valiant. Circumſtances of the other-ſort ſhall plentifully occurre in the whole carriage of his enſuing actions. In both which, are verified two contrary rules; for the ſtate of the firſt obſeruations teacheth vs with Plautus, that Centum doctorum hominum conſilia hæc vna vincit Dea; This one Goddeſſe can effect more, then the wits of an hundred learned men; ſpeaking, as an Heathen man, of that famous Idoll Fortune; and in the ſecond, that which Iuuenall excellently noteth;

(3) Now for the Character of this famous wiſe Prince (which with reaſon ought to be ſet in front to his actions, as certaine lights of the minde, by which to diſcerne the fountaine of counſels and cauſes) a * learned, eloquent Knight, and principall Lawyer of our time, giues vs many things, of which theſe ſelected, are very regardable. (4) * Another hauing a purpoſe to write in Engliſh the Hiſtory of this Henry (an Argument which for the worthy doing thereof, requires as wiſe a man as Henry himſelfe) hath among many extraordinary praiſes (moſt-what framed out of his ſtrong affection) truly noted concerning his atchieuement "of the Crowne: That the Almightie

Nothing certainly: for that he (as elſe-where that Writer ſaith) was the Salomon, who brought peace to this Kingdome, long before oppreſſed by warre and tyranny: it was only an excellent effect of that excellent moderation. Other Authors of our times concurre in the ſame judgement of him, whom they praiſe * for ſingular wiſedome, excellent temperance, and moderate frugality; for * policie, juſtice, and grauitie: which Princely vertues cauſed him to be highly reuerenced of forraine Princes. Theſe honourable Eulogies, after ſo many yeeres from his death, juſtly countenance their relations, who * writing in or about his owne dayes, auerre no leſſe; among whom, Bernard Andreas of Tholouz is moſt flowing and abundant. This Andreas (as himſelfe writes) was afterward entruſted with the inſtruction of Prince Arthur (eldeſt ſonne to King Henry) in good letters, though hee was blinde; and hauing aſwell the title of Poet Laureat, as of the Kings Hiſtoriographer, (how hardly ſoeuer thoſe two faculties meet with honour in the ſame perſon) meant to haue Hiſtorified and Poetized the Acts of this King, but (for want of competent and attended inſtructions in many places of chiefe importance) left his labour full of wilde breaches, and vnfiniſhed; yet in ſuch points as he hath profeſſed to know, not vnworthy to be vouched: for there is in him a great deale of cleare elocution, and defæcated conceit aboue the ordinary of that age. He, among other verſes in honour of this our Henry (whom hee enſtyleth The moſt ſapient King) hath theſe, not hyperbolicall, but proper, wherein he ſalutes him.

Princeps ingenio nitente præſtans,
Famâ, religione, comitate,
Senſu, ſanguine, gratiâ, decore.

A Peereleſſe Prince, for wiſedome rare,
Fame, piety, courteſie, debonaire,
Knowledge, birth, grace, and feature faire.

Whereby alſo, after theſe pourtracts of his inward faculties, and gifts, may be gheſſed that a body they had for their mortall manſion, no way vnſutable, and it ſeemes by that Maieſty (ſo they call the Images of our Kings, which are carried for repreſentation in their funerall Chariots) which at this day is * extant, that he was of ſtature tall and ſlender, ſomewhat round viſaged, & though in * his childhood ſickly, yet of aſpect in all his outward lineaments, ſo noble and gracious, as well preſaged, and afterward fitted the moſt fortunate height to which he was now aſcended. But notwithſtanding theſe great praiſes, there want not ſome who thinke him to haue beene an heauy Father to the Common-wealth, which by ſundry courſes hee greatly laboured to bring vnder, as a ſeeming ground-worke of his owne, and his poſterities ſecuritie. And in his laſt dayes, Auarice (the naturall malady of age) tooke him ſtrongly, the enuy whereof hee partly diuerted from himſelfe by the ſplendor of ſome few publike buildings, which as they gaue the people cauſe to talk of their brauery, ſo ſo they alſo inſenſibly wrought in their light minds a mitigation of their burthen.

(5) Let vs now behold his vertues as they are ſhiningly deduced into action. After the Battell, he hauing truely firſt aſcribed the whole good of his ſucceſſe to God, * commanded, that to the body of his enemy King Richard, an honourable interrement ſhould be giuen in the Friers at Leiceſter, where notwithſtanding * he was with little reuerence buried. From thence the King made ſpeed to London, as to the chiefe ſeate and Epitome of the Engliſh Monarchy, without which no Prince found himſelfe heere ſecure enough: hee entred the Citie vpon a * Saturday, as vpon a Saturday he obtained his triumphall and Crowning victory. The Major of London and his fellowſhip, * receiued him in Violet at Harnſey Parke, but his entrance (which was at * Shorditch) was honoured with a very great troupe of the Peeres, and Nobles in his traine, at which our Poeticall Hiſtorian Andreas was preſent, and ſaluted the victorious Prince with certaine Latine Sapphicks, which hee ſung vnto him, as himſelfe writeth. But Henry ſtayed not in Ceremonious greetings and popular acclamations, which (it ſeemes) he did purpoſely eſchew, for that (Andreas ſaith) he entred * couertly, meaning belike, in an Horſe-Litter or cloſe Chariot. His lodging was in the Biſhop of Londons Palace, where (after publike offertories and ſolemne thankes giuen to God in the Cathedrall Church of S. Paul) the buſineſſe of his Coronation was ſeriouſly conſulted of; which was afterward (vpon his remooue to the Tower, where hee * created his Vncle Iaſper Earle of Pembrooke, Duke of Bedford, and other Eſtates) with due pompe and rituall magnificence * accompliſhed at Weſtminſter.

(6) But the naturall Solder and indiſſoluble Cement, which muſt make this Kingdome ſtand, was his marriage with the Lady Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter of the late Edward the fourth. This, as a point of moſt importance, was with great maturitie and judgement againe thought vpon, when Henry was now already crowned. The remoter danger, ſuppoſed to reſide in the perſon of Edward Earle of Warwicke (onely Sonne and heire, euen in his infelicities, to that vnfortunate Prince George Duke of Clarence) was preuented; for he had beene by King Henries direction, brought vp priſoner from the Mannour of * Sherifhutton in Yorkſhire, (where aſwell hee, as the Lady Elizabeth were kept by King Richard vnder-guard) and immediatly ſhut vp within the Tower of London.

(7) Francis * Duke of Britaine had offered Henry, before his departure, to match him with the Lady Anne his eldeſt Daughter and ſole heire, but hee was otherwiſe affected, as placing his loue where it might afford him greateſt and preſenteſt ſtrengths. Andreas addeth, that King Edward himſelfe deſtinated his eldeſt Daughter vnto Henry then Earle of Richmond, and ſought in his life-time to haue effected it; but his meaning being (belike) ſuſpected, as but a drift to get Henry into his hands, the motion tooke no hold, as reſerued till God had cleared the way of all ſuch impediments as might hinder the conſolidation of both the Royall Families, Yorke, and Lancaſter, (after their ſo mortall and confuſiue maſſacres) in the perſon of one Soueraigne.

(8) The Lady her ſelfe, beſides youth and beautie (precious Ornaments of that Sexe) had in her from her * infancy a wonderfull feare, and care to pleaſe God, and a like dutious and humble carriage toward her Parents: her Brothers and Siſters ſhee did exceedingly loue, and as well toward the poore, as all the Seruants of Chriſt, ſhe bare a ſingular affection. * Her Vncle (the late Vſurper) in contempt of God and man (whoſe Lawes hee was ſo long accuſtomed to violate, till the juſt reward thereof did at the length ouertake him) inceſtuouſly meant to haue defiled her, vnder the abuſed name of Matrimony. When therefore the newes of his death came to her eare, the joy of her heart brake forth into theſe words: * *So, yet at the laſt thou haſt, ô God, regarded the humble, and not deſpiſed their prayers. I well remember, neither ſhall I at any time bee weary to remember, that my moſt Noble Father, of famous memory, meant to haue beſtowed mee in marriage vpon this moſt comely Prince. O that I were now worthy of him! but my Father beeing dead, I want ſuch good friends as ſhould motion ſo great a matter: and perhaps he will take a wife from forraigne parts, whoſe beautie, age, fortune, and dignitie ſhall bee more then mine. acquainted my mother therewith? Baſhfulneſſe forbids. What if ſome of the Lords? Audacitie wanteth. O then that I might but conferre with him! perhaps in diſcourſe I might let ſlip ſuch a word as might diſcouer my intention. What will bee I know not: this I know, that Almighty God cannot tell how to abſent himſelfe from them who truſt in him. Therefore I make an end of thinking, and repoſe my whole hope vpon thee, O my God, doe with mee according to thy mercy. Shee ſecretly thus reuoluing all matters, and reſoluing of them in her minde, was heard from aboue; for King Henry hauing vnderſtood the honour, chaſtitie, and ſingular vertues of the maiden Princeſſe, the rather inclined to make her the Soueraigne of his affections, aſſigning therefore * a day, wherein (for the vtter aboliſhment of all Hoſtilities betweene the two Royall Houſes of Yorke and Lancaſter) to eſtabliſh an vnion of Families, by conjunction of their two perſons in marriage.

In the Parliament was attainted Richard late Duke of Glouceſter, ſtyling himſelfe by vſurpation, King Richard the third; and with him, by name, many other of the Nobility and Gentry. And yet withall, to lay a foundation for his greene Gouernment in loue and clemency, hee, during the Parliament, proclaimed free pardon and entire reſtitution of their fortunes, to all ſuch as ſubmitted themſelues to his mercy, and made oath of Fidelity. And to remooue all ſcandall and danger from his friends, hee reuerſed and reuoked all former Acts, hurtfull either to himſelfe, or to them for his cauſe, the whole Houſe of Parliament, * concurring finally in eſtabliſhing by a ſolemne Act, the Crowne vpon him and his heires for euer.

(12) Meane-while there were not a few who did enuy to King Henry this vnexpected height of felicitie; but they who firſt diſcouered themſelues, were certaine remaines of the late ouerthrow at Boſworth, whoſe diffidence, or euill-will, was greater then to relie vpon King Henries

The attempts of the Kings maligners.

Henries clemency, or to behold the dazeling brightneſſe of his new atchieued glory; and for that cauſe refuſed to forſake the Sanctuary, which they had taken at Colcheſter. Theſe were, the Lord Louell, Sir Humfrey Stafford, and Thomas Stafford his brother. Who, while the King, ſecure of dangers behind him, was in his Progreſſe at Yorke, meaning by affability, bounty, and other his wiſeſt courſes, to gaine the good wils of the Northerne people, (with whom the memory of King Richard was very deare) and ſo to weaken the ſtrengths & hopes of all future conſpiracies, forſooke their refuge, and ſecretly in ſeuerall places gathered forces, therewith to ſurprize and dethrone the King. The Lord Louell raiſed his forces with ſuch ſpeed, that the King, who at Lincolne firſt heard of his eſcape, and lightly regarded the ſame, was no ſooner ſettled in Yorke, but certaine intelligence came that he approached faſt with an Army; and withall, that the Staffords had aſſembled forces in Worceſterſhire, meaning to aſſault the City of Worceſter. The extremity of the King (who neuer dreamt of ſuch a darling) was not ſmall, for neither had he any ſufficient numbers about him of his ſure friends, nor could iuſtly repoſe confidence in the Northerne men, whoſe loue to King Richard their late ſlaine Lord, made them ſtill ſuſpected. But danger quickeneth noble courages, and therefore vpon due recollection of himſelfe, hee armes about three thouſand men, (if tanned leather, whereof the moſt of their breſt-pieces, for want of other ſtuffe, were framed, may be called armour) and ſends them vnder the leading of Iaſper Duke of Bedford, with commiſſion to pardon, or to fight. The Duke offering pardon, the Lord Louell fled by night to * Sir Thomas Broughton into Lancaſhire, where he lurked certaine moneths; the headleſſe multitude yeeld without ſtroake, and the felicity of King Henry preuailes in euery place; for the Staffords hearing what had happened to their Confederates, diſperſe their Cloud of Rebels, and ſpeedily take refuge at Colnham, a Village about two miles from Adingdon in Oxfordſhire. But the priuiledges of that place * being iuridically ſcand in the Kings Bench, they were found vnable to afford protection to open traitors: whereupon they were forceably taken thence, and conuayed to the Tower of London, from whence Sir Humfrey Stafford was drawn and executed at Tiburne, but his brother Thomas by the Kings mercy had his pardon. Theſe ſhort dangers and troubles, by reaſon of their ſuddainty did worthily make the King wakefull euen ouer ſmaller accidents; this blaze being kindled from ſo neglected ſparkles. But there followed deuices, which in their owne nature were ſo ſtrangely impudent, and in their vent ſo ſtrongly bolſtered, that if Louels enterpriſe made him ſuſpitious, theſe other might iuſtly fill him with innumerable iealouſies.

(13) The records are immortall, which teſtifie, that the erection of Idols and Counterfeits, to dethrone them who are in poſſeſſion, is a very old Stratagem. What troubles a Pſeudo-Nero wrought, by ſupport of the Parthians (who wonderfully fauoured Nero liuing,) the Romane Writers teach vs. Neither hath the Diuell (Father of Impoſtures) any ſo ſolemne practice, as Perſonation and Reſemblances of true, whether men or things. Inſomuch that ſomie Diuines haue thought, that as hee can, and often doth tranſ-ſhape himſelfe into the forme of a Celeſtiall Angell, ſo that he alſo deceiued our firſt mother vnder that reſplendent but aſſumed habit. And what miſchiefe he wrought, in this very kinde of thruſting out into the world falſe pretenders, the ſpeech of wiſe * Gamaliel teſtifieth, who rehearſeth the names of Theudas and Iudas Galilæus; but the world hath ſince had more woefull experience hereof, in that execrable Impoſtor Mahomet, pretending to bee the Meſſiah. In England it ſelfe (before the time of this Henry) what ſtrange practices and conſpiracies were ſet on foote vnder the title of a Pſeudo-Richard, in the raign of Henry the fourth, the former Hiſtories haue ſufficiently opened, ſo that this Prince encountred nothing new in the generall, howſoeuer peſtilent and extraordinary in the particular. Indeed his raigne (more perhaps then any other of his predeceſſors) afforded plentifull matter for ſuch deuices to worke vpon, there being many then, who hauing beene * conceiued (as it were) in the bowels of Sedition, and nouriſhed with the bitter and pernicious milke of diſſention, were not onely apt to embrace, but alſo, where they were not offered, euen there to beget occaſions of confounding all. Men, * who could neither endure warre, nor peace long, nor any lawes in either, as deſirous *desirous to enioy the licentious violences of ciuill warre; a * misery, which all words (how wide soeuer) want compasse to expresse.* The strange attempts of which kinde of men (or rather Monsters) we shall see exemplified in the subsequent tragedies. Richard Simon, an ambitious and impostorous wretch, and withall a Priest, neither vnlearned, (the sacred shadow of which name the rather countenanced his practices) in hope to make himselfe the principall Bishop of England, plotted the aduancement of Lambert Symnell (being his pupill in the Vniuersity of Oxford) to the Crown of England; instigated thereto by the diuell, and suborned by such as fauoured the White-rose faction, vpon this occasion. There went a rumour, that Edward Earle of Warwicke, sonne and heire to George the late vnfortunate Duke of Clarence, second Brother of King Edward, * was either already murthered, or should shortly be. This Architect of guile, Simon, hauing this Symnel in tuition, (the * sonne of a Baker, or Shoomaker, but a well-faced and Princely-shaped youth, of no * very euill nature, but as it was corrupted by his Tutor,) meanes, out of this rumours aëry substance, to produce an apparition and prodegy, which in Title, behauiour, and artificiall answeres (infused by his Tutors practices) should resemble * one of King Edwards Children. Here we must confesse, that our Authors leade vs into a perplexity: Some* affirming, that this counterfeit was exhibited to the world, vnder the name of Edward Earle of Warwicke, sonne of the Duke of Clarence, by the daughter of the most turbulent and fatall Earle of Warwicke, slaine at Barnet-field. But hereunto reason seemes repugnant. For what ground of claime could that Gentleman haue, not onely for that his Father was attainted, but much more for that the Queene of England then in being, was the indubitate eldest daughter and heire of King Edward the fourth, and sister and next heire to Edward the fifth? Neither wants there ancienter authority then any of the others, affirming, that this Idoll did vsurpe the name of one of King Edwards sonnes; many arguments concurring to buttresse this affirmation. For, if at the same time (as Polydor writeth) it was bruted, that *the sonnes of King Edward the fourth had not * beene murthered vnder their vsurping Vncle* Richard, but were escaped, and liued in obscurity beyond the Sea; how can that be true, which Stow and the rest (who follow Polydore therein) affirme, that Lambert was crowned King of England at Dublin in Ireland, as heire to George Duke of Clarence? For with what iniury to the royall brethren (fained to bee aliue) was that? Verily there seemes no coherence in the circumstances, nor apparence of truth in the substance. And how much stronger to the purpose of the Conspirators was the fiction of an Edward, the Kings sonne, and himselfe once proclaimed King, then of an Edward, who was but an Earle, and a Duke of Clarences heire? But you will aske, what was the poore Earles part in this tragedie? what other, then that by rumoring his murther, they might bring the person of King Henrie into common detestation for his cruelty? For clearing wherof, the King publikely afterward shewed the Earle to the view of all. And albeit the vulgar fame is, that Lambert was called Edward, yet * one who then liued, saith directly, that this Cypher was dubbed and mounted from his owne meane ranke, to the Title of a King, vnder the name of the second Brother, who for certaine was called Richard: but what Record there is to the contrary, is to vs as yet vnknowne; for our vulgar Bookes extant can hardly passe with a Iury of ordinary Criticks, and Censors for vnchallengeable euidence.

(14) This aëry Typhon (which grasped at the embracement of the two Kingdomes of England and Ireland) thus throughly schooled and instructed, is secretly conuayed by his Sinonian Tutor to Dublin, the chiefe Citie of the Irish, where hee was confident of partakers, as amongst the hereditary Clients, and adherents of the House of Yorke; which affection was first breathed into them by the cunning popularities of the Lord Richard Duke of Yorke, the first of that line, who publiquely claimed the English Crowne. His hopes deceiued him not, for the Lord * Chancellor of Ireland, Thomas Fitz-Gerald (of the noble Familie of the Geraldines) presently professed himselfe for the plot, and by his authoritie and perswasions drew the generalitie of the Irish after him into it. Messengers are hereupon dispatched, vpon all hands both into England, to such as they had hope of, and into Low Germany to the (15) Henrie seeing the fire so strangely kindled round about the walls of his best hopes and strengths, falls seriously to counsell at the Monastery of Carthusian Monkes neere Richmond, where after exact deliberation it was decreed, 1. That generall pardon (to stay the minds of as many as it was possible) should without any exception bee proclaimed to such as from thenceforth should continue dutifull. Which was principally done, to temper and assure some priuate persons, as Sir Thomas Broughton and others, whose forces, wills, and wealth were held most in suspicion. 2. That Elizabeth, late Wife to Edward the fourth, and Mother in law to Henry now King of England, should forfeit all her lands and goods, for that (contrary to her faith giuen to them, who were in the plot for bringing in King Henry) shee had yeelded vp her daughters to the hands of the Tyrant Richard. 3. That Edward Earle of Warwicke then prisoner in the Tower, should be openly shewed aliue in London. All which was accordingly executed, but without any great fruit, for still the plot went on.

Conclusions in the Councell of England vpon the same of this conspiracie

(16) The condemnation of Elizabeth Queene Dowager, rather mooued enuy towards Henry, then relieued his cause; for, to many the justice of that sentence was doubtfull, the circumstance of a Mother in law inferred a breach of pietie, and the judgement it selfe did also want example. The justice was doubtfull both in regard of the cause, and of the proceeding: Of the cause, for how could she haue defended her Daughters, by the priuiledge of Sanctuary, from such a Wolfe and Tyger, as would haue infringed it for her Sonnes, had they not beene quietly deliuered to his bloody hands? The same Tyrant doth now demand her Daughters, as to honour, not to slaughter; but if it had beene to slaughter, what helpe? Shee, terrified with the motion, after much deliberation yeelds them to him, when shee neither could nor durst detaine them. But you say shee violated her faith; and hazarded thereby the liues and hopes of all that were in the plot for her cause. A great crime certainely. But Richard was in Title, and Power a King, and hung ouer her head with ineuitable terrours; when Henry of Richmond was but an Earle, and he farre off, and in banishment, and without any appearance of preuailing, and her selfe a friendlesse widdow. The manner or proceeding was no lesse strange; for by what law or tryall was shee condemned in a Præmunire? Shee neuertheless is put out of all, and confined to the Monastery of Bermondsey in Sourthwarke, where finally shee ended her dayes, borne to bee an example of both fortunes, hauing from a forlorne Widdowes estate, beene raised to the Bed of a Batchelour Monarke, and in his life time beene reduced to the seeming of a priuate fortune, when her Lord was driuen to flie the Land; and afterward saw those turnes and varieties as few Queenes euer felt, or saw so many, or more contrary; whether we regard the height of worldly felicitie, when shee did behold her Sonne a King, or the depth of misery, when the Tyrant inuaded his Crowne and life, or now her Daughter being Queene, and her selfe a miserable prisoner. The consideration whereof, as it may worthily mortifie ambitious affections; so the strangenesse of the sentence verifies that collection among others, which * that learned Gentleman makes of this Kings Raigne, in these words; Hee had (saith hee) a very strange kinde of interchanging very large and vnexpected pardons with seuere executions. Neuertheless, (his wisdome considered) it could not bee imputed to any inequalitie, but to a discretion, or at least to a principle, that hee had apprehended, that it was not good, obstinately to pursue one course, but to try both wayes. Howsoeuer that was; certainly, shee beeing so just an object of his commiseration, who had married that Daughter, by which hee enjoyed a Kingdome, and gotten that very power, wherewith hee ruined her, it cannot bee reasonably thought, but that there were other most important motiues, perswading such a sharpe course, or otherwise, that it must bee reckoned among among the chiefe of his errours. But as in the times of her flouriſhing eſtate, ſhe founded and endowed a faire Colledge for Students in Cambridge, which of her is called the Queenes; ſo we will leaue to thoſe her Beneficiaries the farther ſearch of this Argument, and deploration of her fortune, which ſeemes ſuch to vs, as if King Henry affected to leaue ſomewhat in this example, wherewith to oppoſe and amaze the World. Vnleſſe perhaps it were, that hauing proclaimed a generall pardon for all offences, without exception, to ſuch as future ſhould remaine loyall, and foreſeeing that ſome, who might be willing to lay hold of that benefit, might alſo be cunningly practiſed-with to fall away, vpon diſtruſt of his word, when once hee had ſerued his preſent vſes, he therefore meant (by ſo cleare a demonſtration, as the vtter vndoing, and perpetuall impriſonment of his Wiues own Mother,) to giue them aſſurance, that he, who vpon her perſon had beene ſo ſeuere a puniſher of faith-breach, would neuer violate it in his owne, and thereby ſecure them in that point, and ſecure himſelfe of them.

A probable cauſe why King Henry dealt ſo rigorouſly with his mother in law.

(17) Yet neither could this deuice take ſo good effect, but that Iohn Earle of Lincolne (Sonne of Iohn de la Pole Duke of Suffolke, and Elizabeth King Edward the fourths Siſter) ſecretly fled into Flanders to the Dutcheſſe of Burgundy, whither Francis Lord Louell was likewiſe not long before eſcaped. Sir Thomas Broughton (another principall confederate) temporized in England, there to remaine a ſtay to the buſineſſe, as well for mutual intelligence, as receipt of an Army when it ſhould arriue. This Earle of Lincolne, beſides that he could not with any patience, behold a Lancaſtrian weilding the Engliſh Scepter, was alſo of a * ſharpe wit, and high reach; and therfore not without an ambitious ſenſibilitie, that in countenancing King Henry, hee wronged that expectancie, and relation to the Crowne, which hee had in right of his Mother, Siſter to King Edward the fourth, and to King Richard the third, who had * deſigned him for heire apparant, and contracted his Siſter the * Lady Anne de la Pole, to Iames Prince of Scotland: was alſo the rather animated by * letters receiued from his Aunt the Dutcheſſe of Burgundy, earneſtly calling vpon him for his preſence. This Dutcheſſe was the ſecond Wife of Charles Duke of Burgundy, * ſlaine by the Switz at the Battell of Nancè; by whom though hee had no Iſſue, yet by reaſon of her great Dower, and wiſe behauiour among the Dutch, ſhee was ſtrong in money and friends; all which ſhee was willing to conuert to the vtter ſubuerſion, howſoeuer, of the Lancaſtrian line. Though therefore, ſhe well knew that this Lambert was but an Idoll, * hammered out of the hot braine of that Boutefew Richard Simon, yet ſhee embraceth the occaſion, countenanceth the Impoſture, and leaues nothing vnſaid or vndone, which might giue life and ſucceſſe to the enterprize. The Earle, the Lord Louell, and others, ſhee furniſhed abundantly, and joyneth vnto them a renowned Coronell Martin Swart, a Gentleman of * honourable birth, exemplary valour, and ſingular experience, and certaine ſelected Companies, to the number of about two thouſand Almaines, which ſoone after arriue at Dublin. Lambert, who before was but proclaimed, is now in Chriſts Church there ſolemnly by them crowned King of England, * feaſting and triumphing, rearing mighty ſhouts and cryes, carrying him thence to the Kings Caſtle vpon tall mens ſhoulders, that hee might bee ſeene and noted; as hee was ſurely (ſaith Stow) an honourable Boy to looke vpon; though nothing leſſe was meant, then that hee ſhould enjoy that honour if they preuailed; as meaning then to erect Edward Earle of Warwicke. Poſteritie might worthily doubt of the truth of theſe ſo deſperate impudencies, and ridiculous Pageants, practiſed in the higheſt affaires of mankinde, but that the thing is ſo vniuerſally teſtified, and alſo that the higheſt affaires of the world (when once they are paſſed) are little better then ſuch like Pageants.

kept at the Ports, to hinder the eſcape of Malecontents or factious Fugitiues: yet he manifeſtly ſaw, that it would in the end come to a Field: for which cauſe he takes order for the leuie of an Armie, reſoluing to giue his enemies Battell with the firſt opportunity, it being the ancient and manfull faſhion of the Engliſh (who are naturally moſt impatient of lingring miſchiefes) to put their publike quarels to the triall of the ſword. Lambert attended with Iohn Earle of Lincolne, Francis Lord * Viscount Louell, Thomas Fitz-Gerald, or rather Maurice Fitz-Thomas (belike his ſonne) and Coronell Swart, with an Army of deſperate and pickt Souldiers, as well Engliſh, Dutch, as Iriſh (all fired with infinite hopes and promiſes to bee enioyed vpon the ouerthrow of King Henry) come on ſhoare in Lancaſhire at a place called the pile of Fowdray, where they ioyne with their aſſured Confederate Sir Thomas Broughton; and his ſequell; and after ſome ſhort refreſhment in thoſe parts, march with erected courages againſt King Henry, taking their way thorow Yorkeſhire (the hoped Nurſery of their ſureſt friendſhips) and glorioufly publiſhing their new King euery where, though without any increaſe of force by concourſe, (for King Henries wiſedome had marred their errand,) their journey was directed toward Newarke vpon Trent.

(19) The King then at Couentrie, being by ſuch ſcouts as he had appointed for that ſeruice, preſently aduertiſed of Lamberts arriuall, and hauing his forces ready vnder the conduct of Iaſper Duke of Bedford, and the Earle of Oxford, becauſe delay, in this caſe, was on all hands reputed miſchieuous, ſets forward to Nottingham, and by a Wood ſide called Bowrs, encampeth his people; in whom there appeared a gallant forwardneſſe to reuenge themſelues, by the ſword, of that indignity which was offered to the Engliſh name by Strangers and Rebels, who durſt hope to giue them a Ruler. Thither repaired George Talbot Earle of Shrewesburie, George Lord Strange his ſonne, Sir Iohn Cheinie, and other noble and valiant Gentlemen with their numbers, which added no ſmall ſinewes to King Henries muſters. Polydor * hath diligently ſet downe the names of ſuch principall men in thoſe parts as repaired thither, partly voluntary, partly ſent for to the common defence of the King and Kingdome; but without due additions of each mans degree and place of precedency; yet their names doe well deſerue to be remembred, both for the honour of their Families, and examples of loyalty. Hee recounteth ſixtie fiue Captaines which aſſembled from places thereabout, vnder whom there cannot probably be thought fewer Souldiers then eight or tenne thouſand, the Engliſh vſually, till of late, hauing commonly an hundreth and fiftie in a Company. Their ſurnames (beſides Edward Lord * Haſtings) are in him as followeth; Longford, Montgomerie, Vernon of the Peke, Shurley, Folgehan, Griſley, Sutton, Stanley, and Stanley, Houghton, Meryng, Stanhop, Clifton, Stapleton, Willoughby, Perpoinct, Babington, Bedyll, * Brudenel, Markham, Merbury, Borough, Tyrwit, Huſey, Shefield, Newport, Ormeſton, Tempeſt, Knyuett, Willoughby, Dygby, and Dygby, Harrington, Sacheuerel, Vyllers, Fylding, Poultney, Vaux, Gryne, Gryfin, Lucy, Belknap, Throgmorton, Gray of Ruthin, Wolſton, Fynder, Philips, Cheiney, Cotton, St. Iohn, Mordant, Terell, Rainſford, Paynton, Daniel, Marney, Armidel. From the vttermoſt bounds of the North, there repayred alſo other chiefe Perſons and Leaders (ſaith he) as * Ogle, * Neuile, * Latimer, Bulmer, Langford, Norres, Neuyle of Thortinbrig, and Williams. The Earle of Lincolne neuertheleſſe comes forward with his Counter-King, nothing perhaps adding greater courage to that ſide, then the example of Henry himſelfe, who with leſſe numbers (but much more ſecret Art) preuayled in a pight field at Boſworth: his meaning was to get into Newarke. The King wakefull vpon all aduantages, and perfectly inſtructed of his enemies courſes, (whom deſperation did thruſt forward to a daring hope) diſlodgeth with his Army, and paſſeth thorow Newarke, leauing it behind him about three miles, to intercept the Lambertines; and there ſits downe againe. The Earle of Lincolne encampes with great brauery and ſhew of courage in the face of the Kings forces.

(20) The next day both the Armies are brought forth to fight, neere to a little village called Stoke. The Earle of Lincolne marſhalled his people by the aduiſe of Coronell Swart, and others, to the beſt aduantage; vpon the * Brow or hanging of an Hill, expecting the charge. and approued men, and throughly well-appointed, and ſo in likelihood were ſuch Engliſh as ſtood for that ſide; but the Iriſh, beſides multitudes and fierceneſſe, had ſmall prouiſion, ſaue (after the rude manner of their Nation) darts, skeines, or the like. The maine of the Battell reſted wholly vpon the Engliſh and Almaines. King Henry on the other ſide, (as he that thirſted for an end of this bloody dayes worke,) ſpeedily diſpoſed his whole numbers into three Battalions: the Vaward whereof was beſt repleniſhed with ſtore of choiſe and picked men, well armed and appointed, and fortified with wings. The armie being thus ordered, Andreas ſaith that King Henrie vſeth this ſpeech:

King Henries Oration before the battell at Stoke.

"(21) Moſt faithfull Lords, and you "moſt valiant Companions in Armes, "who haue (together with Vs) endured "ſo great perils by Land and Sea; loe, "we are againe, againſt our wils, drawne "to trie our fortunes in another Field. (22) The Earle of Oxford, (on the behalfe of the whole Army) was prepared to make anſwer: but the King haſtening to the proofe, brake off all Ceremonies; and the ſigne of Battell giuen, they thunder forward with ſhouts of people, and ſound of martiall muſicke, and like a blacke tempeſt, powre themſelues vpon the Front of the Enemies Battels; who ruſhed forward with equall violence and furie, as men that at once encountred againſt feare & fortune. The fight continued doubtfull aboue * three houres. A long ſpace for men of courage to be employed in killing one the other, and fit to glut the hunger of furie. The Earles Engliſh wanted nothing but a good cauſe, and the Almaines gaue not place to the Kings people in any point worthy of gallant Souldiers, but ſold their liues dearely, and their Coronell Swart had ſcarce any before him in perſonall performance. Neither were the Iriſh behinde for their parts, if their skinnes had beene ſword-proofe, for the contempt of death was alike in them as the reſt. Briefly, the wonder of that dayes worke was, that Chriſtian men, in no ſounder a quarrell, could dare to die ſo boldly, ſuch chiefly, as the Earle of Lincolne and ſome others, who knew the ſecret of that deſperate enterprize. But God, the Lord of reuenges; puniſhing their vniuſt malice, with a ſuddain whirle-winde, riſing in the heate of the Battell, (euen as when Conſtantine fought againſt the enemies of the Church) our ſouldiers, who ſeemed vanquiſhed, became victorious. For the Kings Vant-gard * re-enforced it ſelfe, and gaue ſo furious a recharge, (in likelihood vpon this encouragement, ſent as it were from Heauen) that it vtterly brake the Enemies ſquadrons, and giuing in among them with full randon, ſlew * firſt ſuch Captaines as reſiſted, and put the reſidue which yeelded not, either to the ſword or flight. Herewith the whole Armie * ſhouted, the Trumpets ſound victory, and the generall cry runnes King Henrie, King Henrie. When the battell and chaſe were ended, ſo that there was time and leaſure to view the field, it then appeared what mindes the ſlaine bodies carried: for all the chiefe Captaines, the Earle of Lincolne himſelfe (though the King would gladly haue had him ſaued, to come thereby to a greater light of his dangers) the Lord Louell, Sir Thomas Broughton, Coronell Swart,

(23) Among the Priſoners was the Counterfeit himſelfe, and the lewd contriuer of this wicked ſtratagem, Richard Simon, who with little change may moſt truly be called another Sinon. The King, (who reſerued himſelfe in this battell, as in others, but * neuer retired) made both their perſons examples of his clemency. For Lambert beeing queſtioned, how *ſuch a * breeching-boy as hee was, durſt attempt ſo great a wickedneſſe, denied not, that he was compelled thereunto, by certaine bad perſons, who were of that conſpiracy*; and as for his parents quality, hee confeſt them to bee ſuch as indeede they were; altogether of baſe and deſpicable calling. * Sim ſubtill, or Sir Richard Simon the Prieſt, whether for diſcouery of ſome great ſecrets, or the extraordinary reuerence borne to his function (extraordinary ſay wee, for otherwiſe * Prieſts had beene openly put to death) was not executed, but * condemned to a dungeon, and perpetuall ſhackles. * Lambert (whom the glittering periwig of regall ſtyle did but lately ſo adorne) was condemned to * the Kings kitchen, there to manage ſpits at the fire; who if his wit and ſpirit had anſwered his late Titles, would haue choſen much rather to haue beene turned from the Ladder by an hangman. But * hauing in this abject condition giuen ſufficient proofe that hee was but a Puppet, or a property in the late tragicall motion, * hee was at length (promoted wee cannot ſay) made one of the Kings Falconers, in which eſtate it ſeemes he liued and died inglorious. This battell was fought vpon a * Saterday, a day of the weeke which is * obſerued to haue beene fauourable and luckie to this Henry. His firſt care after the victory ſettled, was that which moſt became a religious Prince, the humble and joyous acknowledgement of thankes to God, in the very place. From thence hee paſſeth to * Lincolne, where hee ſpent three dayes in publike ſupplications, proceſſions, and thankſgiuings, and ſent his Standard to our Ladies Church at Walſingham in Norfolke, there to remaine as a Monument of his victory and gratitude. Such as were taken in the Battell or Chaſe, are then executed. From Lincolne he progreſſeth into Yorkeſhire, where hee tooke a ſeuere courſe, as well by execution, as ranſome, for purging thoſe parts from ſuch as were culpable, or probably dangerous. At Newcaſtle about the * middle of Auguſt, he diſpatcheth his experienced and truſty Agent Richard Foxe Biſhop of Exceſter, and Sir Richard Edgcombe Knight, into Scotland, there to ſettle a Peace with King Iames the third, to empeach the retreat and protection which his enemies and Rebels found therein. Himſelfe hauing ſpent a great part of Summer in this progreſſe, or rather itinerary Iuſticing, returnes by Leiceſter toward London. Thoſe prudent Ambaſſadors in the meane time negociating with the Scottiſh King, wrought * him to bee more inclinable to a perpetuall Peace; then it ſtood with his ſafety to let his Subjects vnderſtand, who fauoured him not. Seuen yeeres truce is conſented vnto, with a ſecret promiſe of King Iames to renew that terme, as it began to expire; with which aſſurance the Ambaſſadours returning, gladded their wiſe Soueraignes heart; who thereby found, that the Biſhop of Exceſter was no leſſe induſtrious in preſeruing his Regall State, then he had beene prudent in furthering Him vnto it. The fire-brands and readieſt fuell of Rebellion thus ſeemed to be quenched, and the King beholds himſelfe in the grace and fauour of his people, nor leſſe of forraine Princes; Margaret Dutcheſſe of Burgundy (his implacable * Iuno) excepted; whom the newes of her Nephewes the Earle of Lincolnes death, and the bloody blowing vp of all her late hopefull and coſtly contriuements, did gall and wound extremely; but added freſh appetites of reuenge to her former immortall malice, which * neuer gaue ouer working, till ſhe had vented another no leſſe prodigy then Lambert was. (24) The next maine action which ſifted the judgement, and tride the ſinnewes of King Henry, was a forraine caſe, of more difficulty and Art, then of inteſtine danger, as in which the high and paramount reſpects of Common-weale were intãgled, or encountred with offices moſt neerely concerning the honour of a Princes minde, which neuer is more blemiſhed then with the note of ingratitude. A diſpute and combate betweene wiſdome and blood, publike and priuate, (if any quality, or action of a King may be ſaid to be priuate) which ſeemed worthy of ſo excellent, cleare, and conſiderate a diſcourſe, as that of Henries. You heard what notable fauours and humanities, when he liued a baniſht Earle in the Continent, he had receiued, firſt of the Duke of Britaine, then of Charles King of France; ſo that he ſtood equally (as it were) obliged to them both, and could acknowledge no leſſe. Charles (more ambitiouſly then iuſtly) deſired exceedingly to annexe Britaine to the Crowne of France, taking occaſion of the time, and other circumſtances, which all ſeemed to conſpire with his affections. The Duke old, and the father of one onely daughter ſuruiuing till Marriage; Maximilian King of Romanes, and riuall of King Charles in the ſame deſires, (as well for the Dutchy, as the Daughter,) feeble in meanes; and King Henry as well obnoxious to the French for benefits, as buſied in his particular at home: and the Duke of Britaine, by ſuccouring Lewis Duke of Orleance, and other French Lords, whom King Charles reputed his aduerſaries, miniſtred to the French an occaſion (or colour at leaſt) of warring vpon Britaine, and ſo by the apt concurrence of circumſtances, to annexe it by conqueſt, if by treaty he could not. Henry of England now knowne to be victoriouſly ſetled, ſeemes worth the Courting. Ambaſſadors come from the French, who lay open the wrong offered by the Britaines, in ſuccouring the enemies of France, put Henry in minde of paſſed benefits; and pray his aſsiſtance, or at the leaſt a neutrality; but altogether concealing the myſtery of this war, which was, to annexe Britaine to the Crowne of France. Howſoeuer, Henry, though he well enough knew, that a King muſt euer bee the beſt part of his Councell, (for what are others opinions, if himſelfe want the happineſſe or iudgement to chooſe the beſt?) propounds the points to his priuy Conncell, whereupon he Chriſtianly offers himſelfe a Mediatour betweene the French and Britaine; an office, in which it was apparant hee might beſt ſatisfie all obligations and duties both to God and them. The French pretend liking, but in the meane time follow their deſigne hard. Henry ſends his Chaplen Mr. Chriſtopher Vrſwicke, a man * whom hee very often imployed. The French maske on. Things come to ſome extremities. It becomes manifeſt that King Charles abuſed the King of Englands credulity; for the City of Nants in Britaine was brought by ſiege to point of yeelding, while meſſengers, and packets, outwardly oyled with the name of peace, ſlide to and fro, and the French doubt nothing ſo much, as leſt the Engliſh ſhould ſtirre, before their victory had made Britaine irrecouerable. The Lord Wooduile (as without the Kings will, or priuity) ſlips ouer into Britaine with three or foure hundred choiſe men, to aſſiſt the Duke, and came time enough to be ſlaine with almoſt all his Souldiers, at the battell of Saint Albine, where the French wanne the day; notwithſtanding that the Britaines, the rather to appall their enemies, had apparelled * ſeuenteene hundred of their owne Souldiers in white Coates with redde Croſſes, after the Engliſh manner, and made thereby a ſhew of two Regiments of Engliſh. The Britaines had a great loſſe in that battell, wherein they were made fewer by ſixe thouſand. The Duke of Orleance and Prince of Orange, who then were Britiſh in faction, were taken priſoners in the ſame fight. The French loſt about twelue hundreth, and their Generall an Italian. So that the ſtate of Britaine ſeemed ripe for a fall.

intereſt, which they might expect in him as a man, to bee abuſed by their practices, to the preiudice of his other friend, the Duke of Britaine, (who forgat not to ſollicite and vrge that point) had made the quality of this affaire knowne to the body of State in open Parliament, for that purpoſe aſſembled; as meaning by authority therof to purge himſelfe from all imputation, if, as a King, he did that which the reaſon of Gouernment required, which would not aſſent that Britaine ſhould be made French, leſt by that acceſſion their Neighbourhood might grow intolerable, Britaine hauing ſo many Sea-townes and Out-lets to miſchiefe the Engliſh trafficke. Himſelfe was otherwiſe alſo ſufficiently reſolued, that the generall good ought to predominate the particular, and that his priuate obligations ought not to entangle, or preiudice the publike ſeruice. The Parliament therefore, conſidering that which ſtood for the Common-weale, decrees aide of men and money, on behalfe of the Duke of Britaine; it being (beſides all other reſpects) a perillous example, to ſuffer the great to deuoure the leſſer Neighbour-States, vpon pretences of iuſtice, or reuenge. Forces are leuied; but (for reſpect of King Charles, and in hope that the ſhew of preparations would ſtoope him to equall conditions,) not yet ſo roundly, as the Britaines neceſſities expected. Meane-while, that no formality or Princely Ceremony ſhould be vn-accompliſhed, King Henry by his Ambaſſadors certefies King Charles of his Parliaments decree; prayes him to deſiſt from farther Hoſtility; otherwiſe that he muſt aſſiſt the Duke, but yet (for the French Kings ſake) with this reſeruation, of purſuing his ſubiects no where but in Britaine. Charles made ſmall account of theſe ouertures, becauſe hee truely perſwaded himſelfe that the Engliſh aides would not arriue in ſeaſon; which fell out accordingly; for before that time, the French had gotten that victory, (wherof euen now wee ſpake) at the Battell of Saint Albine. Vpon newes whereof, the Engliſh Regiments were immediatly ſent ouer vnder Robert Lord Brooke Generall, Sir Iohn Cheiney, Sir Iohn Middleton, Sir Ralfe Hilton, Sir Richard Corbet, Sir Thomas Leighton, Sir Richard Lacon, and Sir Edmund Cornewall, Knights, and Coronels. The whole Army contained eight thouſand men. Theſe march toward the enemy; who, acquainted with the temper of the Engliſh, whiles they are freſh, as * being then almoſt inuincible, containe themſelues within their Campe; but yet * moleſt the Engliſh with continuall skirmiſhes on horſe-backe in ſeuerall places at once; finally to the profit of the French, who * were alwaies put to the worſe, the Archers receiued them with ſuch perpetuall ſtormes. In the meane ſpace, Francis Duke of Britaine dyes, leauing in effect, one onely daughter, the Lady Anne, (for the other, * being the younger) deceaſed not long after. This altered the whole ſtate of the caſe. The Britiſh Nobility (vnder their young Miſtreſſe) immediately fall at variance among themſelues, and the Engliſh thereby were on euery hand in danger: ſo that God (as it appeared by the ſequell) had deſtined Britaine to bee annexed to the Crowne of France; for the Engliſh (after fiue moneths ſtay) were in wiſedome compelled to returne; the rather, for that Winter now was come vpon them, and Britaine, deſtitute of competent defence, (her Rulers diſagreeing among themſelues) was finally by the marriage of King Charles with the Lady Anne, made a parcell of the French Monarchy, as hereafter will appeare.

(26) King Henrie the while was againe in danger to haue had preſent vſe of Souldiers at home. We ſhewed, what care was heretofore taken by him to weede the North, and free it from lurking enemies. That notwithſtanding, when the Earle of Northumberland, (Lieutenant of the North) ſignified at an Aſſembly (according as the truth was) that the King (though the Northerne people had beſought it) would not remit one penny of ſuch Subſidy, as was granted in Parliament for ſupportation of the warres in Britaine, * leſt the Acts of State ſhould bee reuerſed at the rude peoples pleaſure; but that on the contrary, Commiſſion and Warrant was ſent downe for him to ſee the ſame leuyed by diſtreſſe, or otherwiſe: the deſperate multitude, falſely ſuppoſing that the Earle was the occaſion of ſuch an anſwer, did ſuddenly ſet vpon him at the incitement of one Iohn à Chamber, and furiouſly murdered him, with certaine of his ſeruants in a place called Cocklegge by Thruſk, eighteene miles from Yorke. (27) The vnworthy death of the Earle of Northumberland, was ſeconded by a more vnworthy, of Iames the third King of Scotland, ſo as King Henry loſt at home a moſt honourable ſtay of his Northerne affaires, and a ſure Ally abroad. This vnfortunate Prince, hauing * by ſome irregularitie of life, and partialities, and errours of gouernment (amplified perhaps by the conſtructions and reports of his malignant Subjects) incurred extreme hatred with many of the Nobilitie and people, laboured with * King Henry, as alſo with the Pope, and King of France, to make an accord betweene him and his Mutinadoes, for that they had compelled Prince Iames, his Sonne, to be the titular and vnnaturall Head of thoſe armes, which traiterouſly (as pretending to haue a right on behalfe of the Common-weale to depoſe an euill King) they aſſumed againſt him. The Kings accordingly interpoſed their mediations by earneſt Ambaſſadors, but could obtaine no other then this outragious anſwer: That there was no talking of peace, vnleſſe hee would reſigne his Crowne. King Henry and King Charles vehemently proteſted againſt theſe their whole proceedings, declaring by their Ambaſſadour, That they thought the ſame to bee as a common injury done vnto themſelues; and the example to bee very wicked and pernicious, and not ſufferable by Princes, that Subjects ſhould be permitted to put hands vnto their Soueraigne. Hereupon it came to a Battell at Banocksborne by Striuelin, whereat King Iames (raſhly fighting before his whole numbers were come) was (notwithſtanding the contrary commandement of the Prince his Sonne) ſlaine in the Mill of that Field, whither he fled after the Battell ended. By reaſon of this infortunate precipitation of the Scottiſh King, Hadrian de Caſtello an Italian Legate, whom Pope Innocentius the eighth had ſent to take vp the cruell quarrell, came too late, (for he arriued not in England till the Battell at Banocksborne was paſſed,) but not too late to receiue honour at the hands of King Henry, who reſpecting his wiſedome and excellent learning, (vpon the ſpeciall commendations firſt, * of Iohn Morton Archbiſhop of Canterbury, but afterward vpon his owne experience of the Man in ſundry employments to the Roman Sea,) beſtowed vpon him the Biſhopricke of Hereford, and (after reſignation thereof) the Biſhopricke of Bath and Welles; who was alſo at the length created Cardinall by Pope Alexander the ſixth. * But who is hee among many thouſands (ſaith Polydor) that vſeth not to admire theſe outward honours which may alike bee giuen to the vnworthy as well as to the well-deſeruing, and may alike bee taken away from either? But the praiſe of this Hadrian is of another farre more noble kinde and eternall: for hee was the man who firſt reuiued the glory of the ancient Latine eloquence, and of all other ſorts of abſtruſe and exquiſite learnings, as in which himſelfe excelled. Thus doth Polydor (himſelfe an Italian,) celebrate the learning of his Countrey-man, of whoſe other qualities, yet others write more harſhly; as that out of meere ambition to bee Pope, (without any other grudge) he conſpired with Alphonſo Petruccio, and other ſacred Cardinals, to murther Pope Leo the tenth: induced thereto thereto by ſuggeſtion of a Witch, who fore-told him that one Hadrian, an old man, of meane parentage, of great learning and wiſdome, ſhould ſucceed in the Papacy. The man thought, it muſt needs be himſelfe, as being, though of very baſe Parentage, yet of ſome noble qualities: but another * Hadrian, the ſonne of a Dutch Brewer, and inſtructer of Charles the fifth the Emperour, prooued to be the man; and this our Hadrian loſt by depriuation all his promotions whatſoeuer, for his nefarious attempt. Into ſuch extreme folly is learning and wiſedome metamorphoſed, where it is tainted with Ambition, or wants a Religious diſcretion to manage it aright.

(28) And albeit the King himſelfe could very gladly haue ſpent his time in the ſtudies of peace, as thoſe which were far more apt for the ſeruice of God, and for attaining of knowledge, then in martial tumults; yet the qualitie of his ſupereminent place enuied vnto him that felicitie; for hee was neceſſarily drawne into a war with France vpon leſſe occaſions. Anne the young Dutcheſſe of Britaine, (by their aduice, who affected to preſerue the libertie of that Dukedome, which by vnion with France, would be abſorpt & extinguiſhed) had ſo farre entangled and engaged her ſelfe with the Procurators of Maximilian King of Romans, that ſhe was not onely publiquely contracted, but contented (for vttermoſt performance of thoſe rites, whereof marriage by proxie was honourably capable) to take vpon her the Bride, and being ſolemnly bedded, to permit Maximilians Deputie, in the preſence of ſundry Noble witneſſes, as well men as women, to put in his legge, ſtript naked to the knee, betweene the ſpouſall ſheets, that ceremony ſeeming to amount to a Conſummation. Charles King of France, notwithſtanding theſe ſolemnities, and his own particular engagement with the Lady Margaret daughter of Maximilian, (whom for the purpoſe of marriage he had already entertained into France,) did ſo ambitiouſly and vehemently couet to gaine Britaine, that vpon confidence of his force, he reſolued to breake thorow all reſpects, and not only to offend all his forraine friends, but to make them his juſt enemies, rather then to faile in effectuation. Inſtruments are therefore very ſecretly ſet on worke, and battery is placed with bags of gold at all the opportunities which might let in his purpoſe. Ambaſſadors alſo (the * Lord Francis of Luxemburg, Charles Marinian, and Robert Gagwine, * Generall of the Order of the holy Trinitie, are diſpatched to Henry, praying that with his good-will hee might diſpoſe of the body of the Lady Anne in marriage, according to the right which he had thereunto, as the chiefe Lord of whom ſhee held the Dukedome. Henry denied the requeſt, but yeelded notwithſtanding to ſend Ambaſſadors into France, there to capitulate about a peace. The French carryed this affaire with notable Art, for to diuert the world for looking into the depth of their drift, King Charles ſtill detained the young Lady Margaret, Maximilians daughter; ſo as at moſt it could bee but ſuſpected, that Charles meant to match her with ſome of his blood, and all the entercourſe of Orators and Ambaſſadors vſed in the meane time, tended but to hold the Engliſh buſied vpon other objects, till they had wrought their feat in the Court of Britaine. For Maximilian, (to let the world ſee what injuries ſhall be offered euen to Kings, that are not ſtrong) him they altogether neglected; King Henry they played with, and Ferdinando King of Caſtile (who was ready to joyne with Maximilian and Henry * againſt the French) they reſolue to appeaſe, with rendring vp vnto him the Counties of Ruſcinoon, and Perpinian; as accordingly they * did, without re-emburſement of one penny of thoſe 300000. Crownes, for which Iohn King of Arragon (father to Ferdinando) had morgaged them. The young Ladies doubts, riſing either out of Religion, or point of honour, his cunning Agents, and Emiſſaries wipe away with theſe ſolutions: That Maximilians daughter was not of yeeres to conſent, and therefore the contract betweene King Charles and her, did not binde either in law, or conſcience: That her owne contract with Maximilian was voide, for that it was done without the conſent of her Soueraigne Lord, King Charles, whoſe Ward or Client ſhe was. The Lady vanquiſhed in her judgement with theſe reaſons, attracted with the preſent greatneſſe of King Charles, and loth by refuſall to make her Countrey the ſeate of a long and miſerable warre, *ſecretly yeelded to accept of another husband. (29) What could now the moſt patient doe leſſe then take ſword in hand, vpon ſo palpable and vnworthy illuſion? But Maximilians wrongs were too impudent and intolerable; for Charles ſent home the Lady Margaret, and married the Inheritrix of Britaine, annexing it to his owne Realme: whereas King Henrie found himſelfe rather mockt, then otherwiſe empaired. Iames Contibald hereupon comes Ambaſſadour from Maximilian, and obtained his requeſt; which was, that they with ioynt forces ſhould by a certaine day prefixed, inuade the French, in full reuenge of theſe their bold prouocations; Maximilian for his part, promiſing to ſupport that warre with at leaſt ten thouſand men for two yeeres. King Henrie hauing formerly in abundant manner prouided himſelfe of treaſure, was ready before the day with a royall Army: but Maximilian (whoſe wil to worke the vttermoſt miſchiefe to France was not doubted,) being ſent vnto by King Henry, ſignifying his forwardneſſe, was found vtterly vnfurniſhed. Cauſes of Maximilians weakeneſſe in ſtate, were the Rebellions and diſlikes of his Flemiſh Subjects, cheriſhed by the French, the jealouſie of Princes neighbourhood, making them vnjuſtly glad either of others moleſtations. For ſubduing whereof, though King Henrie had heretofore giuen him good and ſucceſſefull aſſiſtance, vnder the conduct of Giles Lord Dawbeney, Gouernour of Callis, the Lord Morley, and others, whereby he the rather ouercame; yet was he the feebler, as thē, by reaſon of ſo freſh exhauſtures. King Henrie with good cauſe was not a little troubled at theſe newes, ſecretly ſignified by his truſty Almner Mr. Chriſtopher Vrſwick, and Sir Richard Riſley Knight, his Ambaſſadors to Maximilian; For he was very loth to vndergoe ſo great an Action vpon his particular ſtrengths, though he doubted not to finde a potent party among the Britaines, (whoſe affections were as yet but looſly ſettled toward King Charles,) and yet farre more loth to deceiue the expectation of his owne people, who had ſo largely contributed; Chiefely the Citie of London, out of which, euen in thoſe dayes, he receiued for his furniture in that voyage almoſt * ten thouſand pounds from the Commoners, and (as it ſeemes by our Author) two hundreth pounds beſides from euery Alderman, where the ſame King could not, but with ſome difficulty, leuy in the third yeer of his Raigne a loane of foure thouſand pounds, whereof three of the beſt Companies are noted (as for hauing done and deſerued extraordinarily) to haue lent aboue nine hundred. And verily this wiſe King (knowing how great a ſtrength that rich City was vnto him) humoured that people with all ſorts of popularities, for himſelfe did not onely come among them, and cauſe himſelfe to be entred a Brother, in * one of their Companies, but ware the habit at a publike Feaſt, and ſate as Maſter, as is very credibly reported out of the Records of their Hall. His wiſedome therefore ſaw, that in giuing ouer the inuaſion of France; hee ſhould ſlothfully abandon a goodly occaſion of making himſelfe vniuerſally acceptable to his people. His reſolutions therefore are by him at leaſt-wiſe pretended to continue, and for that cauſe he ſufficiently encreaſeth his numbers, that hee might ſeeme able to goe thorow with that enterprize alone; and though the time of yeere were too farre ſpent (for hee landed not at Callis, till the ſixth day of October) yet marcheth hee with his whole forces toward Boloigne, being well aſſured that with this trowell he ſhould at once plaiſter two wals, that is, humor his Engliſh ſubjects, and for a peace draw to himſelfe ſtore of Crownes from the French.

(30) He had with him, beſides the flower of his Nobility, and Captaines, anſwerable numbers of People fit for the ſeruice. The moſt named perſons were theſe, Iaſper Duke of Bedford, Lieutenant Generall of the Army, Thomas Marqueſſe Dorſet, the Earles of Arundell, Oxford, Suffolke, Shrewesbury, Derby, Kent, Deuonſhire, and Ormond, ſundry Barons, as Dawbeney, Abergenny, Delaware, South, Haſtings, Cobham, &c. But it is needleſſe to weary our ſelues with long relations of a ſhort voyage; for King Henry, before he ſet forth out of England, was ſecretly dealt with by the Lord Cordes Gouernour of Henault, according to inſtructions on the French Kings behalfe, to accept of conditions, which till Boloigne was beſieged (as now by him it was) was not knowne.. ignorance of this myſtery made many forward Gentlemen to morgage their lands, and runne into much debt for their fuller and brauer furniture, in hope to get great matters in this warre, wherof to their griefe they found themſelues deceiued. (31) Boloigne was brought to ſome diſtreſſe, when by interuention of this agreement it remained ſafe and quiet: King Charles was chiefly moued to buy his peace at a deare rate, both for that the ſtate of Britaine was as yet vnſettled, and for that hee meant forth-with to march into Italy for the * conqueſt of the Kingdome of Naples; and King Henry on the other ſide was not vnwilling, becauſe Maximilian had fayled, and Britaine ſeemed clearely paſt poſſibilitie of euiction. To which may be added, a naturall, noble, and religious inclination in King Henry, to liue in amitie with his neighbours; the inkling of new * dangers, then in brewing againſt him by the turbulent, and vnappeaceable Dutcheſſe of Burgundy, and * cheriſhed by King Charles; and laſtly, the enrichment of himſelfe by re-emburſing the charges both of this, and the Britiſh warre, out of the French elſe-where, whereby he ſhould farre the better be able to withſtand all forraine practices, or domeſticke outrages. As for the preſeruing of himſelf, and his honour with his ſubjects, hee wanted not both true and honourable gloſſes: Such as were the care to auoyd vnneceſſary effuſion of Chriſtian blood: the vſes of his preſence at home, beſides many other: but his wiſedome in the carriage of this right weightie action, was chiefly eminent in this: That he would not enter into Treatie, till hee was in the Field; and that with ſuch a puiſſance, as was likely enough to force his owne conditions; nor ſuffer the leaſt ſigne of his ſecret willingneſſe to peace, or inward doubt of troubles at home, to creepe out at any Crany or Chinke of his diſcourſe or carriage, whereby he as farre out-went the French fairely, as they formerly ſeemed to haue ouer-wrought him ſubtlely. Had they truly beene informed in thoſe points, it is probable they might haue gone a cheaper way to worke: for, beſides what other Articles ſoeuer, it was concluded, That Henry ſhould * not quit his claime to France; but that for a Peace, which by the contract was onely to continue during the two Kings liues, Charles of France ſhould pay in preſent to Henry for his charges in that warre, * ſeuen hundred fortie and fiue thouſand * Duckets, and twentie fiue thouſand Crownes yeerely toward the expences which he had heretofore beene at in ayding the Britaines. Which (by the Engliſh called Tribute) was duely paide during all this Kings Raigne, and alſo to Henry his Sonne, till the whole debt was runne out, thereby to preſerue amitie with England. There were moreouer (by Henries conſent, who was thus content to gratifie his Peeres at anothers coſt) not onely preſent rewards, but alſo certaine annuall penſions allotted to the chiefe Lords of his Priuie-Councell. A courſe of bountie which might otherwiſe haue prooued prejudicious to the ſeruice of the King of England, by engaging his Councellors affections to the French: The ſiege of Boloigne laſted till the eight day of Nouember, and Henry (whom his Queenes moſt * tender, frequent, and louing lines, did the rather inuite to ſpeedieſt returne,) hauing ſettled all his tranſmarine affaires, * arriued at Douer, from whence he journied to Weſtminſter, there to celebrate the Feaſt of Chriſtmas. (32) The famous counterfeiſance of Perkin Warbecke, with which the braine of the Lady Margaret Dutcheſſe Dowager of Burgundy had long trauelled, doth now begin to diſcloſe it ſelfe, and make new buſineſſes for King Henry. The inglorious glory of the firſt inuention in his Raigne of this kinde of vexation, Lambert Simnels perſon had giuen to his Maſter the wily Simon, ſo that our Dutcheſſe was but an imitatrix, and yet perhaps ſhe gaue not place in any point to the firſt example, or Archtype, neuertheleſſe the fortune of the firſt deuice, being no more ſucceſſefull then it was, might reaſonably haue deterred her frō the edition of a ſecond: but whether it were an immortall enuy toward the Lancaſtrian race, or a burning zeale of aduancing one that might at leaſtwiſe beare the name of a Plantagenet, though by any ſiniſter practices; as if it had bin lawfull to attaine her ends (admit them iuſt) by any iniurious courſes, ſhee reſolues to erect another Idoll, as perceiuing by the firſt, how notable an engine impoſture was, to trouble Henry; being well aſſured, that England was full of corrupt humors, and ill affections to worke vpon, not ſo much through the deſert of her preſent King, as for that the dregs which naturally reſide in the bottome of mens hearts, where moſt bloody and barbarous factions haue for a long time weltered, and worried one the other with various euent, were not cleanſed and auoided. The Diuell therefore ready to furniſh all attempts which may raiſe trouble, and miſchiefe, eaſily fitted her. There was come therefore to her hands a youth adorned with ſuch a ſhape, as might eaſily perſwade the beholders, was worthy of a noble fortune: he had thereunto a naturall fine wit, and (by reaſon of his abode in England in K. Edwards dayes) could ſpeake our language, as alſo ſome other, which he had by a kind of wandring trauell obtained. This youth was borne (they ſay) in the City of Torney, and called * Peter Warbeck, the * ſon of a conuerted Iew, whoſe Godfather at Baptiſme King Edward himſelfe was. The Engliſh in * contempt (and for a note perhaps of his forraine birth) did afterward call him by a diminutiue of his name, Peterkin or Perkin. Him the Dutcheſſe (as a fit piece of timber, out of which to carue a new Idoll) moulds by degrees, and makes him take ſhape according to that Idea which ſhe had prefigured in her working imagination, before the which the late honours of her houſe, conſpicuous in three Princes (which altogether made not twenty and fiue yeeres of raigne) did ſo perpetually houer, as her ſoule could neuer take contentment, but in the hope that the Houſe of Yorke ſhould againe be the dwelling place of Majeſty.

(33) Her offence againſt Henry wanted not many ſeeming reaſons, but none ſo great, as that hee had ſlaine her owne brother King Richard, who albeit hee was the reputed murtherer of her Nephewes, yet were they a degree more remooued from her, and ſo leſſe deare in likelihood then a brother; and howſoeuer ſhe might ſecretly deteſt, or beleeue the commitment of that parricide, yet could ſhe neuer brooke (ſeeing they were gone) that the reward of her Brothers death, and that euen to him who ſlew him, ſhould be the Crowne of England, whereby not onely her brother, but the whole male-line of her Family was for euer to be excluded; much leſſe could ſhee (a Plantagenet) abide that Henry, who brought to the Crowne the ſurname of a newly raiſed Family. Theſe and other conſiderations in the breſt of a Lady, bred vp in a dominating Family, her ſelfe a Dowager, in ſuch a fortune, as in which ſhe was Paramount for the time, and abſolute without controlment, being careleſſe withall of ſauing for poſterity, becauſe ſhe was without a Child, and in that regard the more abundantly ſtored with treaſure; all which made her ſpirits ouer-boyle with impatience and virulency; ſo farre forth, that hauing infuſed all her principles into Peter her creature, vnder the Title of Richard Plantagenet, ſecond Sonne of King Edward the fourth; ſhee moſt couertly ſends him into Portugall, from thence to take his Icarean flight, as * elſewhere is related. Neuertheleſſe, there will not (perhaps) want ſome, who in defence of the Dutcheſſe, had rather referre it to Magnanimity, and Nobleneſſe of Spirit, in ſeeking the honour of her houſe; which, if it might paſſe for ſuch among the Heathen, yet can it not among Chriſtians; much the leſſe, for that her duty to England, and the royall flouriſhing eſtate of her owne Neece, the right Heire, exacted at her hands a greater tenderneſſe.

(34) That Peter Warbecke ſhould bee inflamed by her fauours, and incouragements, to dare in earneſt the perſonation of a Kings ſonne, ſeemes not a thing to bee admired; for there is in humane nature (which tyes not her ſelfe ſelfe to Pedigrees, nor Parentages) a kind of light matter, which will eaſily kindle, being toucht with the blazing hopes of ambitious propoſitions. Hee therefore vpon the firſt diſcloſe of * himſelfe, did put on ſo excellent a ſeeming, as might juſtly mooue King Henry to be jealous, whereunto the pernicious practice might come at laſt; for there wanted nothing in the whole forme of the young Vpſtart, but onely the conſcience of a truth, and truth it ſelfe: which makes mee call to minde * what one hath written of a goodly white Saphyr in Venice, made by art ſo neerely to reſemble a true Diamond, that with much difficultie, and but by one onely Lapidary it was diſcouered; which if it had beene graced with ſome great Princes wearing, what could want to haue made it paſſable for a very Diamond of greateſt value? Perkin came ſuch from out of the Burgundian forge; and (if his parentage be reſpected) aſſumed the image and reſemblance of a King, beeing otherwiſe not ſo much as a meane Gentleman. Neither can it be maruelled at, if ſuch a Phantaſme as this, did abuſe, and trouble the common people of that time; for euen to ſuch as doe write thereof, it begets a kind of doubt (which without ſome little collection of their ſpirits, doth not eaſily vaniſh,) it ſeeming almoſt incredible, that ſuch a bloody play ſhould meerely bee diſguiſed and fained; the diſcouery therefore was worthy ſuch a wit as King Henries, and the puſh it gaue to his Soueraigntie, did thorowly try his ſitting, being of force enough to haue caſt an ordinary rider out of ſaddle.

(35) Therefore, it was the Dutcheſſes miſ-fortune, that her inuentions (if they were hers) had to encounter ſo politique and conſtant a man as King Henry; whoſe prudence ſearcht into the abſtruſeſt ſecrets, and whoſe diligence ouercame all difficulties. Yet the Lady Margarets courſe to vent her Creature at the firſt was exquiſite; for ſhee (as in a Magicke practice) hauing kept him ſecret till ſhe ſaw her time, cauſeth him to be cloſely conuayed into * Portugall; from whence (attended with fit Aſſociates and Priuadoes) he ſailes into Ireland (the Foſter-place and nurſery of immortall good will to the Houſe of Yorke) where (notwithſtanding their late calamities,) he ſo ſtrongly enchanted that rude people with the charmes of falſe hopes, and myſts of ſeemings, as hee was ſure of partakers in great plentie. Charles the eighth, King of France, hearing (and perhaps beleeuing) that the Duke of Yorke was aliue, and glad to haue ſo probable an occaſion of doing miſchiefe to Henry of England, in regard of theſe flagrant enmities which as then remained vnquencht betweene them, inuites Duke Richard moſt officiouſly to Paris, and beſides all other honours aſſigned him (at his comming) a Guard for his Perſon, whereof the Lord Congreſhall was Captaine. Afterward there repayred to this new Duke, Sir George Neuill Knight, (a * baſtard of the noble Houſe of the Neuills,) Sir Iohn Taylor, Rowland Robinſon, and about an hundreth Engliſh, to whom (as a principall) wee may adde * Stephen Frion, French Secretary to King Henry himſelfe; all which, together with the whole Stratageme, was ſmoakt out of France with the firſt Graine of Incenſe ſacrificed vpon the Altars of Peace at Boloigne, after the ſame was once made and ratified (as you haue heard) betweene the French and vs. The Dutcheſſe then ſeeing her artificiall Creature thus turned againe vpon her hands, Pretends an extreme ignorance that euer ſhee had ſeene him before that preſent, and an exceſſiue joy for his miraculous eſcape, and preſeruation, which ſeemed ſuch to her (as ſhe pretended) as if he had beene reuiued from death to life, and that the fable might want no quickning, which her perſonall countenance, or her Court could afford, ſhee openly ſalutes him by the delicate Title of the * White Roſe of England, and queſtions him of the manner of his eſcape, with ſuch like, to beget a firme beliefe in the hearers, that ſhee neuer had ſeene him before that time, and that he was indeed her Nephew Richard Duke of Yorke. The Nobility of Flanders accordingly, doe vnto him all honour, and ſhee enuirons his Perſon with a Guard of thirtie men in Murrey and Blue. Neither was hee in any point wanting to his part; but fitted ſuch likely anſwers to all queſtions, and ſuch Princely behauiours to all occaſions, as made fame bold to publiſh him with the fulleſt blaſt of her Trumpet, for no other then a true Richard Plantagenet; and as it is ſo obſerued of ſome, that by long vſing to report an vntruth, at laſt forgetting themſelues to be the Authors thereof, beleeue it it in earneſt; ſo theſe honours making our Peter to bury in vtter obliuion his births obſcuritie, hee ſeemed to bee perſwaded, that he was indeed the ſelfe partie, whom hee did ſo exactly perſonate. Noueltie, and impudencie were ſcarce euer knowne to haue found more applauſe, or beliefe, euen among many very wiſe, and (otherwiſe) worthy men; who mooued in conſcience, and not onely vpon diſcontent, inclined to partake with this new Plantagenet, as the only right heire of the Engliſh Diadem, as if, whether hee had beene the true one, it was paſt diſpute. This intoxication, and abuſion of the world, was wonderfully encreaſed by the ſecret reuolt of Sir Robert Clifford Knight, whom (as one that had ſeene, and known the true Richard) the cunning Conſpirators in England had ſent ouer, to informe himſelfe, and them, whether he was indeede as hee ſeemed. Sir Robert (whoſe preſence and errand were to the Dutcheſſe moſt welcome,) being brought to his ſight, did forthwith giue credit, and conſtantly ſignifie, that this was indeed Richard Plantagenet, the true Duke of Yorke, and that he as well knew him for ſuch. Money and encouragements were hereupon ſent out of England, from ſuch as fauoured him, among whom was * Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlaine to King Henry (by whoſe punctuall reuolt from K. Richard, he had principally atchieued the Crown of England) * Iohn Ratcliffe, Lord Fitzwalter, * Sir Simon Montfort, Sir Thomas Thwates Knights, and others; but the maine countenance of the cauſe in forraine parts was Sir Robert Clifford (a Knight of an honourable fame and Family) which mooued the ſecret friends of the new Duke to ſet the rumour ſo cunningly on foot among the Engliſh, *That * ſooner might a cloud, which cauſeth thunder, bee caught or knowne, then the Author thereof*; and multitudes beeing weakened therewith, ſtore of humour, dangerouſly prepared to mutation, did euery-where diſcouer it ſelfe.

(36) For preuention therefore of all thoſe effects which might iſſue out of theſe cauſes, (being in their proper nature moſt generatiue of ſedition, and of all ſorts of ciuill furies) King Henry diligently cauſeth the Coaſts of England to bee well and ſtrongly watcht, aſwell to empeach the landing of enemies, as the eſcape of fugitiues: but aboue all, he

perhaps to the contrary. Whereas facts are to be prooued by confeſſions of parties, by witneſſes, or vehement preſumptions, (though vehement preſumptions are ſaid to conſtitute but an halfe proofe) all which are *other-where ſo ſupplyed, as leaues ſmall cauſe to doubt of both their deaths. But Warham (a learned Prieſt and Doctor in the Lawes) the mouth of that Ambaſſage ſent to the Arch-Duke, in the end of his Oration vſed this bitter ſcoffe and Sarcaſme againſt the Lady *Margaret: That ſhee in her old age brought forth two Monſters within the ſpace of a few yeeres, and both of them not in the eighth, or ninth moneth after their conception, as naturall mothers, but in the one * hundred and eightieth moneth; and whereas other women brought forth Infants vtterly vnable to helpe themſelues, theſe births of hers were tall ſtriplings, and as ſoone as they were borne, offered battell vnto mightie Kings.* And albeit the Arch-Dukes anſwer ſeemed reaſonable, yet was not King Henry ſo ſatisfied, but that within a while after, for * that the Arch-Duke had ſecretly furniſht Perkin with Leaders, he tooke occaſion to baniſh all Flemings, and Flemiſh Wares out of his Dominions, and inhibited his Subjects to trade in any Countries within the obedience of Maximilian King of Romanes, or of the Arch-Duke Philip his Sonne, who by way of talio and requitall did the like againſt the Engliſh.

(37) Let vs come now from the addreſſes of things, to their doing. The high prudence and induſtry of Henry hauing thus diſcouered the foundations of Perkins hopes in England, and the humors which were moſt vnſound, made it his firſt worke to raze thoſe groundworkes, and purge the veines of his Realme from that corruption by needfull Phlebotomy. The * Lord Fitzwalter, a principall Conſpirator, being condemned, and ſent to Callis, liued there in hope of pardon; but for practiſing with his Keepers to eſcape, hee finally payed his head for ſatisfaction. Sir Simon Montfort, Robert Ratcliffe, and William Dawbeney (Gentlemen of Noble houſes) as Captaines and Authors of the Conſpiracie, were beheaded, but all the reſt, aſwell Clerkes as Lay-men, had their pardons. Not long after theſe executions and pardons, the King vpon ſure intelligence that Sir Robert Clifford (in whoſe boſome the ſecret of all Perkins plot lay) was arriued, entred the Tower of London, and there continued; that ſo, if Clifford ſhould accuſe any of the Great, (and whom he then would accuſe, it is probable King Henry knew) they might without ſuſpition, or tumult, be attached; the Court and publique priſon for crimes of higheſt nature, beeing then within the cincture of one and the ſame wall. Sir Robert Clifford at his comming into the Kings preſence, (though he was ſecretly before aſſured of his life) moſt humbly praying and obtaining pardon, appeached (among many others) Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlaine. The King would not at firſt giue credit (or at leaſt-wiſe pretended not to giue credit) to the accuſation of a Peere ſo great, and ſo neere vnto him: but vpon farther ſearch, finding the ſame confirmed with circumſtances, and particularly, for that he ſaid to Clifford, * Hee would neuer beare Armes againſt the young man, if hee knew him for certaine to bee the Sonne of King Edward, he reſolueth to vſe ſeueritie againſt the delinquent.

him, in reſpect of paſſed ſeruices, they (in their effects conſidered) being the greateſt whereof mortalitie is capable, preſeruation of life, and gayning of a kingdome: But the poore Gentleman found himſelfe farre deceiued in his politicke Lord and Maſter, who (to teach mankinde thereby, how dangerous it is to make a King) was not vnwilling to cut him off, as perſwading himſelfe, that thoſe ſeruices proceeded of ambition, not of affection, or if of affection, the cauſe now ceaſing, the contrary effects might prooue as pernicious, as the other had beene aduantageous and auaileable. The King was vnwilling to diſpleaſe his Father-in-Law, Thomas Earle of Derby (Brother-German to Sir William Stanley) and did therefore for a while ſuſpend his judgement; but rigour finally preuailed, hee was at Weſtminſter openly arraigned, conuicted, and afterward at the blocke on Tower-hill beheaded. In whoſe office Giles Lord Dawbeny a moſt faithfull and moderate man ſucceeded. This ſharpe juſtice exerciſed vpon ſo eminent a perſon, was of great vſe in the ſtay of peoples minds thorow the Realme of England. But in Ireland they were not ſo ſettled, or reduced, but that for the better and fuller purging thereof, Henry Deny (a Monke of Langton Abbey) was ſent Lord Chancellour thither, with orders and directions, and Sir Edward Poynings Knight, with Souldiers; whoſe greateſt diligence and cares were not wanting, to puniſh ſuch as heretofore had ayded Perkin, or might hereafter. The Earle of Kildare Lord Deputie, falling into ſuſpition with Poynings, was by him apprehended, and ſent priſoner into England; where the King did not onely graciouſly heare and admit his defences, but alſo returned him with honour, and continuation of authoritie. In the meane time (the errour, or weakeneſſe of the Burgundian Dutcheſſe and her Perkin, ſuffering their enemy in this ſort to puruey for his owne ſecuritie, and their depulſion) and King Henry for farther aſſurance of himſelfe, makes a progreſſe into Lancaſhire, there to recreate with his Father in law the Earle, and the Counteſſe his Mother, where among all other his ſecret purpoſes, hee throughly ſatisfied the Earle, both for the juſtice and neceſſitie of Sir William Stanleys death.

(39) Theſe certainely were perillous times to liue in, and vndoubtedly full of infinite jealouſies, and hypocriſies, not vnlike to thoſe lately paſſed, * Wherein there was nothing ſo plaine, and openly prooued, but that yet for the common cuſtome of cloſe and couert dealing, men had it euer inwardly in ſuſpect, as many well-counterfeited jewels make the true ſuſpected: Theſe generall diſtruſts being among the ſtrange gradations, by which the incomprehenſible Prouidence doth vſe to chaſtiſe inſolent Nations, and to make regular Princes meere and abſolute. But the Dutcheſſe and her Perkin knowing all things as they paſſed in England, reſolue notwithſtanding to proceed; and therefore taking aduantage of the Kings abſence in the North, he with a force of broken and diſcontented perſons, ſets Saile for England, and approcheth the coaſts of Kent about Sandwitch and Deale, there to begin his enterprize for obtaining the Crowne of England, vnder the borrowed name and title of Richard Duke of Yorke, if he found the Commons forward. But they, though doubtfull at firſt what to doe, yet at the laſt conſidering that his Souldiers were for the moſt part of deſperate fortunes, and felonious qualitie, (though hardy otherwiſe, and approoued men of warre,) remembring withall the miſchiefes of part-takings, would not adhere, but trayning them within danger vpon promiſe of ſuccour, and aſſaile, driue them to their ſhips, take fiue of their Captaines, Montford, Corbet, Whitebolt, Quintin, and Genin, and * one hundreth, ſixtie foure others, which were all of them afterward executed. Perkin himſelfe, who would not truſt his perſon on ſhore, beeing worthily troubled at the in-auſpicious fortune of his followers, preſently hoiſed ſailes, and returned to his Lady Patroneſſe and Creatrix, into Flanders.

The moſt modeſt King hauing ended his ſpeech, doth forth-with (ſaith our Author) ſeriouſly deliberate with his Councell what was to be done hereafter. It may probably ſeeme, that he had with-drawne into the North, to inuite Perkin (by occaſion of his abſence) the rather to take Land, that ſo he might draw all his dangers into one place, and decide them in a Battell, if his Subjects ſhould reuolt to Perkin in any numbers, or if they did not, then might hee fall into his hands, by landing vnwarily vpon truſt of the peoples fauour, and ſo by a more compendious and eaſie way ſettle his Eſtate, of which he failed but little, by the ſaid counter-policy of the Kentiſh-men. In regard whereof, in the firſt Act of Councell, praiſe and thankes were decreed to them, with which Sir Richard Gilford Knight was preſently ſent away, and order taken for the erection and watching of Beacons vpon the Coaſts.

(41) The Dutcheſſe on the other ſide, ſeeing the South of England proue ſo dry, and barren to her drifts, conueighes againe her Idoll into Ireland, where ſhee well knew there could not want partakers; and Perkin himſelfe daring to entertaine the hope of a Crowne, (for by ſo long perſonation of a Kings Sonne and heire, ambition had throughly kindled his youthfull blood) was now no little cauſe of bringing things to an iſſue by his owne forwardneſſe. * Maximilian King of Romanes, whether as one willing to keepe the Engliſh buſied (* Henry hauing forbidden his Subjects all traffique with the Flemmings, and all other of his Sonne the Arch-Dukes Subjects,) or as crediting the fiction, and therefore led thereunto in honour and conſcience; * Charles alſo King of France, but ſpecially the Dutcheſſe of Burgundy, (by whom this bubble was firſt blowne vp, and put abroad) did concurre to the moleſtation of King Henry; Maximilian, and the French King, more ſecretly, but the Dutcheſſe with all her Oares and Sailes plyed it in open view. Borne vp by theſe ſupporters, he the rather eaſily drew the Iriſh to aſſent to his pretext; but his Councel weighing with themſelues, that the Iriſh-mens friendſhip, how firme ſoeuer, was inſufficient in reſpect of their nakedneſſe and pouertie to worke their wiſhes, he according to ſuch aduices as were taken before his departure from his Creatrix, croſſeth into Scotland, for feare of puniſhment, ſaith * Andreas; if perhaps by the Kings true Subjects within Ireland hee ſhould chance to bee apprehended; but the euent ſhewes, that it was not onely for his more ſecuritie, but principally to ſtrengthen his enterprize with the Scottiſh ayde, whereof in thoſe dayes hee had ſmall reaſon to bee doubtfull; and his caſe was ſuch, that no third courſe was left vnto him, but either to fight and conquer, or liue branded with immortall infamy both of Cowardize and Impoſture. Henry hearing theſe things, was not ſlacke to prouide for his juſt defence, greatly carefull vpon what coaſt this wandering cloud would at length diſſolue it ſelfe, in what effects ſoeuer; and therefore obſerued all his wayes with as much curioſitie as was poſſible.

two ſonnes Edward and Richard Duke of Yorke both very young, Edward the eldeſt ſucceeded their Father in the Crowne, by the name of King Edward the fift: that their Vncle Richard Duke of Glouceſter to obtaine the Kingdome, purpoſed to murther both, but the inſtrument employed by him to execute the execrable Tragedy, hauing cruelly ſlaine King Edward, the eldeſt of the two, was mooued to ſaue Richard his Brother, whom neuertheleſſe the world ſuppoſed to haue beene alike barbarouſly made away; though falſely ſuppoſed; for that himſelfe there preſent, was that very Richard Duke of Yorke, brother of that vnfortunate Prince, King Edward the fift, now the moſt rightfull and lineall ſuruiuing Heire-male to that victorious and moſt noble Edward of that name the fourth, late King of England. * That hee in his tender age thus eſcaping, by Gods mercy, out of the County of London, was ſecretly conuayed ouer the Sea, * whither when hee was brought, the party who had the conueiance of him in charge, ſuddenly forſooke him, and thereby forced him to wander into * diuers Countries, where hee remained certaine yeeres as vnknowne, * till at length hee came to the true vnderſtanding of himſelfe. * In which ſeaſon it hapned one Henry, ſonne to Edmund Tydder Earle of Richmond, to come from France, and enter into the Realme, and by ſubtill and foule meanes, to obtaine the Crowne of the ſame, which to him the ſaid Richard rightfully appertained. That Henry, as his extreme and mortall enemy, ſo ſoone as hee had knowledge of his beeing aliue, imagined, and wrought all the ſubtill waies and meanes hee could, to deuiſe his finall deſtruction. That the ſaid mortall enemy hath not only falſely ſurmiſed him to bee a fained perſon, giuing him Nick-names, ſo abuſing the world, but that alſo, to deferre, and put him from entrie into England, hee hath offered large ſummes of money to corrupt the Princes, with whom hee had beene retained, and made importune labour to certaine ſeruants about his (the ſaid Richards) perſon, to murder or poiſon him, and others, to forſake and leaue his righteous quarrell, and to depart from his ſeruice, as Sir Robert Clifford, and others. That euery man of reaſon may well vnderſtand, that the ſaid Henry needed not to haue mooued the fore-ſaid Coſts, and importune labour, if hee had beene ſuch a fained perſon. That the truth of his cauſe ſo manifeſt * mooued the moſt Chriſtian King Charles, and the Lady, Dutcheſſe Dowager of Burgundy, his moſt deare Aunt, not onely to acknowledge the ſaid truth, but louingly alſo to aſſiſt him. That now becauſe the Kings of Scotland (Predeceſſors of the ſaid King Iames) had oftentimes ſupported them, who were reft and ſpoyled of the ſaid Kingdome of England, (as in freſheſt memory King Henry the ſixt,) and for that hee (the ſaid King Iames) had giuen cleare ſignes, that hee was in no noble qualitie vnlike to his Royall Anceſtors, he, ſo diſtreſſed a Prince, was therefore mooued to come, and put himſelfe into his hands, deſiring his aſſiſtance to recouer the Realme of England, promiſing faithfully, to beare himſelfe towards the ſaid Scottiſh King, no otherwiſe, then as if hee had beene his owne naturall brother, and would (vpon recouery of his Inheritance) gratefully doe to him all the pleaſure which lay in his vtmoſt power.

(43) Perkins ſpeech ended, and his amiable perſon being fitted with ſo many countenancing circumſtances of State and ſeemings, (by the recommendations of great Princes, ayde from the Iriſh, aſſured hope of ayde in England, and his own well-appointed company,) made ſo ſtrong an impreſſion in the young Kings conceit, that, albeit there wanted not ſome, who with * many arguments aduiſed the King to repute all but for a meere dreame, and illuſion, his perſon was honourably receiued, as it became the perſon of Richard Duke of Yorke, and in his quarrell entertained; which the more to grace in the Worlds eye, hee gaue his conſent, that the ſaid Duke of Yorke ſhould take to Wife the Lady Katherine Gordon, daughter to the Earle of Huntley, being neere Couſin to the King himſelfe, a young Maide of excellent beautie and vertue. By which marriage, as the gentle King abundantly declared, that hee tooke him for the very Duke of Yorke, ſo Perkin, * (diſtruſtfull of the Scots, * and deſirous to gaine the loue and fauour of the Nobles of the Realme) cunningly ſerued his owne ends for the preſent, paſſing current for a Prince of high blood, and royall hope. Vpon this ground a warre was preſently vndertaken againſt Henry, and entred into; the King of Scots in perſon, and Perkin, followed with great numbers, ſpecially of Borderers, fell vpon ſundry parts of Northumberland, which they moſt grieuouſly afflicted, burnt and ſpoyled, publiſhing neuertheleſſe by Proclamatiō made made in the name of Richard Duke of Yorke, much fauour and immunity to all ſuch as would adhere to his juſt quarrell, and a * thouſand pounds in money, and one hundreth Markes by yeere of land of inheritance to the meaneſt perſon, that could either take or diſtreſſe his great enemy, who (he ſaid) was flying the Land. But King Henry by his diligence and wiſedome, had ſo ſettled the minds of his people in thoſe parts, that there is no mention made of any one perſon which offered his ſeruice. This vnexpected auerſion ſo blankt & dampt the Scottiſh enterprize on Perkins behalfe, that the King offended therewith, retired with his Army (laden with bootie) into his Realme, and from thenceforth eſteemed of his new Couſin the leſſe. But King Henry not minding to forgiue ſo vnjuſt and cauſeleſſe outrages, calles a Parliament, opens his griefes, and prayes ayde for an inuaſiue warre againſt Scotland, which was generally aſſented vnto, there being ſcarce any more gratefull propoſitions to the Engliſh in thoſe ſwording times, then warre with French or Scots: an humour, vpon which this King did practiſe to inrich himſelfe. For the publike monies by theſe occaſions came into his Exchequer, with a ſmall part whereof he flouriſhed out a ſhow of hoſtile prouiſions, and the Remainder therevpon (if peace enſued, which he alwayes knew how to bring about with honour) was clearely his owne without account. The ſumme aſſented to bee gathered, was * ſixeſcore thouſand pounds, and for collection thereof were granted two diſmes, and an halfe, and two fifteenes. But the leuie of this money ſo granted in this Parliament, kindled a dangerous blaze in England; in ſo much, that the Lord Dawbeney being ſent Generall of the Forces againſt the Scots, and vpon his way thither, was recalled by occaſion of inteſtine troubles.

(44) Which troubles had their Originall from the leuy of ſuch payments among the Corniſh, as were aſſeſſed for the Scottiſh warres. When therefore the Collectors came among them, the People (being a ſtout, bigge, and hardy race of men,) tumultuouſly aſſembled; whom one Thomas * Flammocke a Lawyer, and Michael Ioſeph, a Blackeſmith or Horſe-Farrier of Bodmin, like firebrands of rebellion, inflamed, and were followed as Captaines, not without ſecret and ſilent relation (as it may be ſuſpected) to Perkins pretences, and that hope of redreſſe (if he were King,) which, by his Proclamations he had colourably giuen to the people, at the time of the Scottiſh Inuaſion; where, among many other things, (tending to humour ſuch as were maleuolent, by making the perſon and gouernment of King Henry odious,) this we finde.

(45) Our great enemy (ſaith the Proclamation) *to fortifie his falſe quarrell, hath cauſed diuers Nobles of this our Realme, whom he held ſuſpect, and ſtood in dread of, to bee cruelly murdered: as our Couſin Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlaine, Sir Simon Montford, Sir Robert Ratcliffe, William Dawbeney, Humfrey Stafford, and many other, beſides ſuch as haue dearely bought their liues, ſome of which Nobles are now in the Sanctuary. The Corniſh rebellion.

* Polyd. Virgil. Iob. Stow Annal. Hollinſh.

Realme, &c. ſhall by Gods grace, and the helpe, and aſsiſtance of the great Lords of our blood, with the Counſell of other ſad perſons, &c. ſee that the commodities of our Realme bee employed to the moſt aduantage of the ſame, the entercourſe of Merchandize betwixt Realme and Realme, "to bee miniſtred and handled, as ſhall "more bee to the Common-weale, and "proſperitie of our ſubiects: and all ſuch "diſmes, taskes, tallages, beneuolences, "vnlawfull impoſitions, and grieuous ex-"actions as bee aboue rehearſed, to bee "fore-done, and laid apart, and neuer from henceforth to bee called vpon, but in ſuch cauſes as our Noble Progenitors, Kings of England, haue of old time beene accuſtomed to haue the aide, ſuccour, and helpe of their Subiects, and true Liegemen.

(46) The tide of people being thus vp: Flammocke and the Blacke-Smith (hauing firme promiſe of the Lord Audleys perſonall helpe) led them forth toward Kent, where they doubted not greatly to increaſe their numbers; and had in likelyhood ſo done, but that the ſingular diligence and wiſedome of the King, fruſtrated their hopes by ſundry Princely Acts. Yet they flow on; and to ſhew what they durſt doe, they ſlew in their way at Tauntford, the Prouoſt of Perin, one of the Commiſſioners for the Subſidie; and marching forward, without offering other violence, Iames Tuichet Lord Audley joynes himſelfe at the City of Wells vnto them, according to ſecret agreement, and becomes their Generall. From Wells they proceed to Salisbury, thence to Wincheſter, and ſo toward Kent, where the Countrey was ſetled and prouided. But the King farther doubting that the Scots would take freſh occaſion, by theſe ſeditious vproares, to inuade the borders of his Realme, diſpatched Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey (* a Peere of excellent vertue) to defend thoſe parts, with the helpe of the Biſhopricke of Durham, and the Marches, till theſe home-commotions were appeaſed; that then the Lord Dawbeny might with a juſt and full Army proſecute the warre againſt the Scots. But Iames their King, perceiuing the end of the Engliſh inteſtine warres, would bee the beginning of his troubles, thought it beſt by way of anticipation to weaken his enemy before-hand as much as hee could, and thereupon fiercely inuaded Northumberland againe, and * beſieged Norham Caſtle belonging to Richard Foxe, whom the King for his noble ſeruices and deſerts, had now aduanced from Exceſter, and Bath and Wells, vnto the Biſhopricke of Durham. But the Scottiſh King, hope-leſſe to winne the Caſtle, though hauing done much hurt both to it and to the Countrey, withdrew his people, before the Earle of Surrey could aproach with his Army, wherein was the Earle of Weſtmorland, the Lords, Dacres, Strange, Neuill, Latimer, Lumley, Scrope, Clifford, Conyers, Darcy, the Baron of Hilton, and many Knights, as Percie, Bulmer, Gaſgoigne, Penington, Bigot, Bowes, Elarker, Parr, Wharton, Strangwith, Conſtable, Ratcliffe, Sauile, Gower, Muſgraue, Mallerie, Loder, Eueringham, Stapleton, Wortley, Pickering, Hiron, Gray, Ridley, Griffith, Fenwicke, Ward, Strycland, Billingham, Curwen, Warcop, Tempeſt, Metcalfe, and others; who miſſing the enemy, marched after into Scotland, and tooke ſuch reuenge as the ſhortneſſe of their ſudden prouiſions would enable.

(47) The Rebels on the other ſide, (whom King Henry thought not good to encounter in their firſt heates; but ſuffered them to tyre their furie, and ſurbate themſelues with a long march, the Coũtries as they paſt being fore-layd from joyning with them) comming neere to Kent, found few, or no partakers there; but the Countrey ſtrongly defended againſt them by the Earle thereof, the Lords Aburgeny and Cobham, with other principall men and their followers; which made diuers of the Rebels ſecretly ſhrinke and abandon the enterprize. But the Lord Audley, Flammocke, Michael, Ioſeph, and the reſt, kept on their way, and encamped vpon Blacke-heath, between Greenewitch and Eltham, from the top wherof they might behold the City of London, and the whole brauery of that Horizon. Here they reſolue to abide the King, or to aſſaile London. The King on the other ſide, by the diligence of the Lord Major, and other the Magiſtrates, ſecured the City, which was full of feare and buſineſſe; himſelfe enuironed with his Nobles, and the choice of the South, hearing where the Rebel was encamped, reſolued by dint of Sword to deliuer his people from tyring expectations, and for that purpoſe marcheth out of London, and encamps in S^t. Georges field, where hee * lay that night. The next day, when he vnderſtood that the Enemy

Enemy had drawn forth his people, and ſet them in battell-ray, he ſends out Henry Bourchier Earle of Eſſex, Edmond de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, Sir Rice ap Thomas, and others, with certaine Cornets of Horſe, and Companies of Archers, to beſet the hill, and the deſcents thereof, while Giles Lord Dawbeny with the ſtrength of his Army, chargeth the Enemy in Front, whom with ſome ſlaughter they draue from the Bridge at Deepford ſtrand; and then mounting the hill, he and the Earles charge the maine ſquadrons on al ſides, and without much labour breake and defeate them. The number of the Rebels ſlaine is vncertainly reported, the ods being betweene * two thouſand and * three hundreth. The Kings Armie returned fewer by three hundreth. Fifteene hundreth rebels were taken Priſoners, and the takers had their Priſoners goods granted them. Iames Lord Audley, Flammocke, and the Smith were taken, and executed. To all the reſt mercy was reaſonably extended. The Lord Audley led from Newgate to Tower-hil in a Coate of his own Armories painted on a paper, reuerſt and torne, there payd his head, for being a Head to that heady Route: Flammocke and the Smith were quartered. Memorably * ſtrange was the comfort, with which this Blackeſmith is ſaid to haue cheered vp himſelfe at his being drawne to execution, ſaying, That yet hee hoped thereby, that his Name and Memory ſhould be euerlaſting. Who could beleeue that the deſire of a long laſting name, howſoeuer, ſhould take the affections of ſo meane a perſon? Such therefore was the end of this inſurrection; but the times being queaſie, the King wiſely forbare to take any ſeuere reuenge vpon more then onely vpon the chiefe Leaders, for hee was truely informed that this calamity had not broken the wills of the Corniſhmen, who remained ready for any deſperate ſudden occaſion, and therefore he abſtained from needleſſe exaſperations, inſomuch as that the quarters of Flammocke, and the Smith being once appointed to haue beene ſet vp in Cornwall for terror, were onely fixed about London, the King thinking good to temper his iuſtice euen in ſuch a circumſtance.

(48) His next care was ſo to order the warre againſt Scotland, that the Peace, whoſe foundations he had laid a farre off, might be made to his more honour: and becauſe the iniuries ſuſtained by the youthfull errour of King Iames, were too publike to bee altogether forgotten; hee ſent the Earle of Surrey, the Lord Neuill, and others, to inuade the Scottiſh borders with an Army, who purſued the reuenge with great vehemency. Meane-while there arriueth in Scotland Peter Hyalus an Ambaſſadour from Ferdinando and Elizabeth, King and Queene of Spaine, as from friends equally well-affected to both parties, to mediate a peace betweene the two Kings of England and Scotland, which perhaps in their owne perſons would not eaſily haue beene brought about, the point of honour might thereunto haue giuen ſuch empeachment. But this was the way to a peace which King Henrie fore-ſaw, there beeing not onely a ſtrict bond of loue betweene him and Ferdinando, but an ouerture, if not a * ſecret concluſion, to match his eldeſt Sonne Prince Arthur with the young Lady Katherine daughter of Spaine, who for her excellent vertues was well worthy to be the happy wife of any Prince then breathing. Hyalus ſo handled the point of his employment, that an honourable truce followed. This Ambaſſadour was a practicke man, of much experience, and knew the better how to deale on the behalfe of King Henrie againſt Perkin Warbecke, (* an imaginary and Stage-play Prince) for that his Soueraigne Queene had alſo beene exceedingly moleſted by a Counterfeit. For Henry the fourth, King of Caſtile, and brother to Elizabeth, beeing vnable to beget Children, Ioan (Daughter of Edward King of Portugall) his wife found meanes notwithſtanding to beare one, by occaſion whereof, after King Henries death, for that it was borne in marriage, a dangerous warre was vndertaken by * Alfonſo King of Portugall, on behalfe of Iſabel the ſuppoſed Inheritrix; but Truth, partly by force, and partly by mediation, was in the end victorious; and Elizabeth, or Iſabella ſiſter of Henrie, ſucceeded to her brother, and brought the inheritance of the Kingdomes of Caſtile and Leon, with her, to Ferdinando King of Arragon. The chiefe point of this truce with Scotland was, That Perkin Warbecke ſhould leaue that Kingdome, ſeeing King Iames, ſtanding vpon his honour, would not deliuer him vp to King Henrie. Perkin hauing now no remedy, did accordingly, taking with him his Wife, the Lady Katherine Gordon; and with ſuch few as remained to him, paſt into Ireland, where hee had not continued long, but the Corniſhmen offer to riſe at his arriuall, and to aduenture their fortunes and liues in his quarrell: Which motion Perkin gladly entertained, as perceiuing yet ſome little hope left to maintaine himſelfe, by the troubles and hazards of others: but the policy and fortune of King Henrie were growne ſo venerable with the Princes his Neighbours, that Ambaſſadors came from France, and from the Arch-Duke of Burgundy; the one to ratifie amity, the other to requeſt the reſtitution therof; both which King Henry (who repoſed his whole truſt next vnder God, vpon the amity of his neighbours) granted, and the Engliſh Merchants (who had beene ſomewhat long forbidden by their Soueraigne to trade in the Arch-Dukes Dominions) * returning to Antwerpe, were receiued into the ſame with Proceſſion: ſo that Perkin could ſcarce caſt his eye vpon any place, not onely where to raiſe aydes, but not where to reſt his head, vnleſſe perhaps in the Court of the Dutcheſſe of Burgundy; neither in all his fortunes did any thing ſeeme miſerable or vnworthy, but the great infelicity of his Wife, whoſe beauty, birth, and honourable qualities ought not to haue beene ſo betrayed by her friends temerity. Perkin hereupon landing at Whitſand Bay in Cornwall in September, found meanes afterward at Bodmin to raiſe ſome thouſands of people, whom with moſt lauiſh promiſes, inuectiue proclamations, and ſtrong impudency, he held together vnder the Title of Richard the fourth, King of England, whoſe fate was none of the happieſt, while the maieſty of her name might ſo be played with by Impoſtors. Perkin thus accompanied, marcheth toward the City of Exceſter, purpoſing if he could winne it by force, to enrich his Souldiers with the ſpoyles thereof, and to inuite all other looſe or loſt people, to his ſeruice by the hope of like booties, and by taking into his poſſeſſion ſuch places of ſtrength as lay in his way to ſecure his retreat, if (according to the ordinarie fortune of warre) any thing ſhould happen to him vnluckily.

(50) But the King (hearing that the Varlet was landed, and againe made head againſt him in Armes vpon truſt of the Corniſh-mens aſſiſtance) is ſaid to haue ſmiled, vſing theſe words; "* Loe, wee are againe prouoked by this "Prince of Rake-hells: but leſt my people "ſhould through ignorance be drawne into "deſtruction, let vs ſeeke to take this Per- "kin by the eaſieſt wayes wee can. Reaſon he had to ſmile, for now hee ſeemed to ſee the bottome of his perill, and as it were to hold his enemy empounded within the Engliſh Ocean, it being a perpetuall and noble wiſh of his, That hee might looke his dangers in the face, and deale with them hand to hand, as the neereſt cut ouer to a full concluſion. He therefore prouides accordingly, aſſembling his forces, and his wits (no leſſe to be dreaded then his forces) ſending forth his eſpyals into all parts to obſerue the tracke, and hopes of this empty cloud, which is now ſeene before Exceſter, a principall ſtrength and ornament of the Weſterne parts of the Kingdome. Parley, and the allurements of words vnder the guilt title of King Edwards Sonne, prooving vnauaileable with thoſe reſolute and faithfull Citizens; Perkin forthwith betakes himſelfe to violence, ſets fire on the gates, mounts his ſcaling Ladders againſt the walls, and with his vtmoſt fury labours to force a ſudden entrance, for that as hee ſuſpected, ſuccours could not long be wanting. The Citizens on the other ſide, and ſuch of the Countrey as came in, prepare, and make a very valiant defence againſt the Rebell, and in ſtead of quenching the fires kindled by the enemy at the gates, to open a paſſage (for they had not Cannon, or any other Ordnance) the Citizens threw on great ſtore of fagots and fuell, and ſo with flame did ſhut vp the way, when the gates themſelues were now conſumed; and in the meane-while they caſt vp trenches, and manne their walls; from whence, with the ſlaughter of about two hundred Rebels at this aſſault, they valiantly draue them. Such meſſengers as by cords ſlipt down the walls, to ſignifie their perill, ſped toward the King; but the loyall diligence of * Edward Courtney Earle of Deuonſhire, the Lord William his Sonne, with many principall Gentlemen of thoſe parts, as Trenchard, Carew, Fulford, Halewel, Croker, Edgecombe, Semar, followed followed with great ſtore of Souldiers, ſaued him the labour of a perſonall reſcue by timely approach.

Perkin at Taunton.

(51) Perkin hearing thereof, riſeth from before Exceſter, and marcheth to Taunton (a goodly towne not farre off) there to take the muſters of his Army, and to prouide for encounter, where hee found very many blanks in the liſt of his numbers, for that they had ſecretly ſhrunke away, as miſ-doubting the ſequell, the Earle of Deuonſhire being ſo neere at hand with the power of the Countrey, and the King vpon his way againſt them, with the Majeſty and terrour of a Royall name and Army, none of the Nobilitie(which was chiefly hoped) comming to their aide. Perkin neuertheleſſe makes ſhew of ſtanding,with ſuch as were left vnto him. The Earle of Deuonſhire marching towards Taunton, in the way there came vnto him Edward Duke of Buckingham, a * young Lord, full of great honour and courage, followed by a goodly troupe of Knights, and others excellently well appointed, both for their owne perſons, and their peoples. Theſe we finde named as principall; Bridges, Bainham, Barkley, Tame, Wiſe, Poyntz, Vernon, Mortimer, Tremail, Sutton, Paulet, Bricknell, Sapcott, Lutterell, Wadham, Specke, Beauchamp, Cheney, Tokett, Long, Latimer, Turberuile, Stourton, Newbrough, Martin, Lynde, Rogers, Hungerford, Semar, Darrell, Barow, Norres, Langford, Corbet, Blunt, Lacon, Cornwall; and many other prime and valiant men of Armes. The King (laſt of all to permit as little to fortune as was poſſible) ſent Robert Lord Brooke, Giles Lord Dawbeney, and that renowned and truſty Welſh-man Sir Rice ap Thomas, with the marrow and ſtrength of his Army before, himſelfe following in perſon with ſuch as hee thought good. Neither was his care cauſeleſſe, for the Corniſhmen were come to that height of deſperate obſtinacy and malice, * As not one of them but reſolued to conquer, or to leaue his carkaſſe in the place. But God loued him and them better, then to ſuffer it to come ſo farre; for Perkin, whether fearing treaſon in his owne Army, or otherwiſe toucht with the conſcience of his qualitie, and damnable eſtate of the quarrell, wherein it was horrible to die, hauing in his troupe but threeſcore horſe, ſecretly fled from the ſeduced Commons. Which when the King heard, hee preſently ſets out fiue hundreth horſe to purſue and apprehend him, before hee ſhould get to the Sea, and ſo eſcape. Perkin and his remaines thus ſtreightned, tooke Sanctuary at Beaulieu, a religious houſe within New Forreſt, (not farre from Hampton) where the Kings Cornets of horſe found them already regiſtred; but according to inſtructions they beſet the place, and maintaine a ſtrong watch about it day and night. The other Rebels the while without ſtroke ſtricken, humbled themſelues to their Soueraignes mercy, and found it in vndeſerued meaſure. Other ſtrong troupes of Horſe are at the ſame inſtant diſpatched to Saint Michaels Mount in Cornwall, where the beautifull Lady Katherine Gorden had beene left by her lewde Husband. Her without reſiſtance they brought ſafely to the King, whoſe beautie the whole Court praiſed, and pittied; but the King moſt graciouſly comforting her, ſent her away well attended to the Queene his Wife, and for her births-ſake allowed her * maintenance, which in honourable manner ſupported her during the Kings life and many yeeres after. Her faireneſſe was ſuch, and her preſence ſo amiable, that ſhee deſerued to bee commonly called The White Roſe; whoſe fortunes (being ſo farre vnworthy either of her birth, her ſingular modeſty, or Wiuely faith, notwithſtanding the ſo abject condition of her Husband) as they mooued juſt commiſeration toward her, ſo they doubled the luſtre of her praiſes.

(52) In the meane-while the King makes a rejoycefull entrance into Exceſter, to teſtifie his princely loue to the Citizens, whom hee highly commended and graced, both for their courage and loyaltie; commanding ſome of the Corniſh Rebels to be executed there, which did the better ſet off the others contrary condition. There alſo hee gaue directions, to offer life, and obliuion of all crimes to Perkin, if he would voluntarily quit the Sanctuary, and ſubmit himſelfe. Perkin being now without hope, without abode, without eſtate, moſt gladly came forth, & did put himſelfe into the Kings hands. Reaſons leading that wiſe Prince to extend this fauour, were drawne out of the depth of true judgement, cleared from vulgar perturbations: firſt, it was not altogether impoſſible, but that Perkin might eſcape him, (though by offering ſelfe-violence) and ſo the world ſhould leeſe the light of ſatisfaction in ſo profound and perhaps a matchleſſe impoſture; then againe, his youth might merite ſome compaſſion; but the infinite deſire which Henry had, from the mouth of the party himſelfe, to learne all the ſecrets of the plot, and who they were that lay vndiſcouered, and yet had finger in the myſticall practice, mooued him to effect the poſſeſſion of his perſon aliue; which now hee had. Thus was this ſo dreaded a blaze of Rebellion ſuddenly and finally quenched; but not without the teares of many in Deuon and Somerſetſhire, whoſe eſtates the Kings Officers ſcruzed and drained, in reuenge of their partaking, and ſupporting the Corniſh Rebels, either in the field, or flight. Henry hauing Perkin in his power, gaue way to all ſuch ſcornes and ſcoffes, which his Courtiers or others were pleaſed to paſſe vpon him, the more to make his perſon contemptible, who well-watched, followed the King to London, whither as he progreſſed, multitudes flockt about to behold the Caitife, * Who beeing a ſtranger, nor any way (whatſoeuer hee boaſted to the contrary) deſcended of Nobles, had dared to trouble ſo great a Kingdome, and by his craftie conuaiances had induced ſo many Princes and Nations (not without miſchiefe and ruine vnto diuers) to beleeue of him, that which he neuer was. And that he might in no part be vnknowne, hee is leaſurely conuaied on horſebacke from the furtheſt part of * London, thorow Cheapſide and Cornhill to the Tower, and backe from thence thorow Canwicke-ſtreete to Weſtminſter, as the ſubject of wonderment, and of all reproach and infamies. The King hauing in this ſort taken reuenge of his ſo ſtrange an enemy, and by curious and often examination comming to the full knowledge of that his ſoule deſired, did ſet ſuch to attend, as neuer went an inch from Perkins ſight, (though he ſeemed to goe at libertie) leſt through the ſlippery Arts of his tempting ſpeech and behauiour, hee might vaniſh into forraine parts, and raiſe freſh ſtormes in England, and bring new comfort to the Lady Margaret Dutcheſſe of Burgundy, the ſinfull countenance of all this curſed Stratagem, whoſe heart was now almoſt riuen in ſunder with the newes of her Perkins moſt hideous ſhame and miſery; the whole bluſhing tenour whereof might eaſily come to her hands at once; for Henry cauſed ſo much of the principall matter, as Perkin had confeſſed, to bee * committed to the Printing Preſſe; (an Art then firſt appearing among vs,) and publiſhed. None can juſtly wonder, that wee haue dwelt ſo long in this wonderfull Story, but rather perhaps wiſh that more particularities (though with more prolixitie) had bin vſed. And though ſome other Actions, as * Sebaſtian Cabots diſcouery, and ouertures of marriages with Spaine and Scotland, came betweene this apprehenſion, and the execution of Perkin, yet haue we thought it beſt, (the ſooner, and at once to rid our hands of a knaue*, as King Henry juſtly called him) to couch all that which concernes him here together, not fearing to incurre among the learned, the taxation of committing therein contradiction, and confuſion of times.

(53) Perkin being thus guarded, doth notwithſtanding attempt to eſcape. And if it were lawfull to inſert particular conjectures, drawne out of the conſiderations of circumſtances, we ſhould perhaps not ſpare to ſay, that his attempt for eſcape, was not without the Kings priuity; vſing ſuch inſtruments to perſwade, or furniſh his flight, as might withall betray him, that ſo by degrees (occaſion taken to cut him off) the Realme might bee rid from ſuch perpetuall matter of trouble. For the depraued wit and will of man might finde or faine reaſons to abuſe the world ſtill, if Perkin were at libertie; as that the confeſſions were extorted by feare, or forged by Henry to ſerue his turne, and the like. Therefore Perkins intention and eſcape (for hee was eſcaped) being diſcouered to the King, all the wayes were beſet, and he ſo cloſe purſued, that in the end betaking himſelfe to a religious houſe of Carthuſian Monkes, he declared who he was, and beſought their Prior in the humbleſt manner he could, for Gods ſake to begge his life, which at the Priors ſuite was granted; but the Kings wrath being kindled, or the paſſage of his ſuppreſſed wrath opened thereby, hee baniſht all former reſpects, commanding him to be fettered, and ſet (for an whole day) in a paire of Stockes, mounted on a Scaffold before the Gate of Weſtminſter Hall; and the next day to bee alike expoſed in * Golden Cheape, to the baſeſt of all contempt and ſcorne, ſo fettered,

And one of my Grandſires vpon my Fathers ſide was named Diricke Osbecke, which dyed. After whoſe death my Grandmother was married vnto Peter Flamin, that was receiuer of the forenamed Towne of Tourney, and Deane of the Boatemen, that row vpon the water or Riuer called Le Scheld. (55) And after I was led by my Mother to Antwerpe for to learne Flemiſh, in a houſe of a Couſin of mine, an officer of the ſaid Towne, called Iohn Stienbeck, with whom I was the ſpace of halfe a yeere; and after that I returned againe to Tourney, by reaſon of warres that were in Flanders: and within a yeere following, I was ſent with a Merchant of the ſaid Towne of Tourney named Berlo, to the Mart of Antwerpe, where I fell ſicke, which ſickeneſſe continued vpon mee fiue moneths. And the ſaide Berlo ſet mee to boord in a Skinners houſe, that dwelled beſide the houſe of the Engliſh Nation. And by him I was from thence carried to Barow Mart, and I lodged at the ſigne of the old Man, where I abode for the ſpace of two moneths.

(56) After this, the ſaid Berlo ſet me with a Merchant of Middleborow to ſeruice, for to learne the language, whoſe name was Iohn Strew, with whom I dwelt from Chriſtmas to Eaſter; and then I went into Portugall in company of Sir Edward Bramptons Wife, in a ſhip was called the Queenes ſhip. And when I was come thither, then was I put in ſeruice to a Knight that dwelled in Lisborne, which was called Peter Vacz de Cogna, with whom I dwelled an whole yeere, which ſaid Knight had but one eye. And becauſe I deſired to ſee other Countries, I tooke licence of him, and then put my ſelfe in ſeruice with a Britaine, called Pregent Meno, which brought mee with him into Ireland. Now, when we were there arriued in the Towne of Corke, they of the Towne (becauſe I was arraied with ſome cloathes of ſilke of my ſaid Maſters) came vnto me, and threatned vpon me, that I ſhould be the Duke of Clarences ſonne, that was beforetime at Dublin.

(57) But forſomuch as I denyed it, there was brought vnto mee the holy Euangeliſts, and the Croſſe, by the Major of the Towne, which was called Iohn Lewelin, and there in the preſence of him and others, I tooke mine oath (as the truth was) that I was not the fore-ſaid Dukes ſonne, nor none of his blood. And after this came vnto mee an Engliſhman, whoſe name was Stephen Poitron, and one Iohn Water, and laid to me in ſwearing great oathes, that they knew well that I was King Richards Baſtard-Sonne; to whom I anſwered with like oathes, that I was not. Then they aduiſed mee not to be afeard, but that I ſhould take it vpon mee boldly; and if I would ſo doe, they would ayde and aſſiſt mee with all their power againſt the King of England; and not onely they, but they were well aſſured, that the Earle of Deſmond and Kildare would doe the ſame.

(58) For they forced not what part they tooke, ſo that they might be reuenged on the King of England: and ſo againſt my will made mee to learne Engliſh, and taught mee what I ſhould doe and ſay: And after this they called mee Duke of Yorke, ſecond Sonne to King Edward the fourth, becauſe King Richards Baſtard-Sonne was in the hands of the King of England. Perkin in the Tower, and the Tragical effects

(59) From hauing thus beene made a publike ſpectacle, till all eyes were wearied with the view, and imaginations tyred with thinking; he is conuaied to the Tower of London: where it had beene happy, if hee had onely wrought his owne deſtruction; but the bloody fate (ſo to ſpeake of his diſaſterous birth) would not ſuffer him to periſh ſingle. In the ſame Tower was priſoner Edward the young Earle of Warwicke, hauing ſo beene from the firſt yeere of Henry to this preſent, for no fault of his, but for that, as a neere Titler to the Crowne, he carried in his liuing perſon inſeparable matter of danger and ſedition. Of his ſimplicity, by reaſon of his education in priſon from his infancy, there is a report, that as one who liued out of the view of the world, he knew not an * Henne from a Gooſe, or one Fowle or Creature from another. To haſten the ruine of ſo innocent a danger, behold, there breakes forth a counterfeit Earle of Warwicke, as if all that which the world ſaw horrible in Perkins darings, had beene but a document to inſtruct others in the like, and that nothing were to be taxed therein, but want onely of ſucceſſe, which whoſoeuer could propound to himſelfe all things elſe, were full of encouragement and reaſon. This counterfeit was a * Cordwainers ſonne of London, aged about twenty yeeres, and called * Ralfe Wilford, who for falſely aſſuming the name and title of the ſaid Earle, being thereunto taught and ſuborned (a practice which well declared that the malicious Dutcheſſe of Burgundy did ſtill liue) was hanged at S. Thomas Waterings by Southwarke vpon Shrouetueſday.

(60) This new deuice to vncrowne King Henry, ſo wakened his owne feares, and the eyes of the Caſtilians, (who had ſecretly agreed to marry their Princeſſe Katherine to our Prince Arthur) that there ſeemed no ſure ground of ſucceſſion, if that the Earle of Warwicke were not made away. A fearefull caſe, where the falſe reaſon of State ſhall faine to it ſelfe an impoſſibility of well-doing, without ſhedding innocent blood, and ſhall therefore reſolue to found vpon ſo crying a ſinne, the hope of perpetuity in ſucceſſion; ſith nothing is truer, then that ſinne was euer an vnſure baſis to ſettle laſting workes vpon. But O the narrow capacities of the moſt ſeeing men! the confidence whereof did vndoubtedly leade this King (herein not iuſtifiable, howſoeuer excuſable in reſpect of humane frailty, which might propound to it ſelfe many feares, and reſpects both publike and priuate) to conniue at the plotted death, or rather formall murther of this harmeleſſe Gentleman, whoſe wrong may yet mooue the hardieſt to compaſſion, as it afterward ſtirred God in iuſtice to reuenge, proſpering no part of that great worke which was thereupon thus corruptly ſought to bee perpetuated. That noble Lady Katherine her ſelfe was hereof ſo ſenſible, that when the diuorce was afterward proſecuted againſt her by King Henrie the eight, her ſecond Husband, ſhe is reported to haue ſaid, That it was the hand of God, for that to cleare the way to her marriage, that innocent Earle of Warwicke was put to vnworthy death. Neither let licentious practices vouch the ſingular Act of Salomon, in taking away the life of his elder Brother Adonias to colour this homicide: for hee that will argue from particular facts in Scripture, ſhall not onely leaue no Adonias liuing, but perhaps no Salomon. To worke this young Warwickes ruine, the miſchieuous and diſmall wretch Perkin becomes an occaſion, if not an inſtrument, for he by his ſupple inſinuations, and flowing promiſes, had corrupted his keepers, the ſeruants of Sir Iohn Digbie Knight, Lieutenant of the Tower; who (as * was affirmed) meant to haue murdered their Maſter, and then to haue ſet Perkin, and the Earle at large, to which practice of eſcape, the poore Earle is ſaid to haue conſented. Perkin for this conſpiracy had his tryall at Weſtminſter, and he, together with one Iohn à Waters, who had bin ſometime Major of Corke in Ireland, were condemned, and being drawne to Tyborne, had the ſentence of death executed vpon them. Perkin at the Gallowes did reade his former confeſſion, taking on his death that the ſame was true, and vnder-went his puniſhment with patience. Walter Blewet, and Thomas Aſtwood (being two of the Conſpirators, for the other two, Strangewaies and Long-Roger, being the Lieutenants men men alſo, were not executed, nor for ſo much as we haue read, arraigned) not long after receiued the reward of their offence at the ſame place.

(61) Iuſtice thus tooke hold at laſt of Perkin Warbecke, on whom, the Prouerbe which ſaith, that Pride is the Vſher of ſhame, was worthily verified. Neither could the world accuſe King Henry for his death, vnleſſe it were, for that he had not hanged him ſooner, but ſuffered him to liue till he had drawne after him a greater ruine in Warwickes perſon, then in all the former Tragedies. For this Earle being a chiefe Prince of the blood, and next heire-Male of his Houſe to the Crowne of England, (a crime of which his birth onely made him guiltie and not any fact of his) being thus charged to haue giuen aſſent to Perkins plot of eſcape, hee was publikely arraigned before the Earle of Oxford (then High Steward of England) by the name of Edward Plantagenet Earle of Warwicke, and indited for *minding to haue eſcaped (as * they ſaid) out of the Tower*, and conſequently (according to the dreadfull licence of inferences among our Engliſh Pleaders in caſes of death) to deprriue King Henry of his Royall Crowne and dignitie, and to vſurpe the Title and Soueraigne office, proſecuting their bloody Poëtry with the like ſanguinary ſyllogiſmes, though vtterly without meaſure, or faſhion. The Earle doubly betrayed, firſt by the ſetters of the ſnare, and then by their ſilly or deceitfull perſwaſions who were put about him, confeſſeth the inditement, and ſubmitteth himſelfe to the Kings mercy; that is, offered vp his head to be a ſlippery foundation of King Henries farther purpoſes; for ſentence of death was thereupon pronounced as againſt a Traitour. This one practice ſeemes ſufficient, if not to caſt vpon Henry the Title of a ſhrewd and perillous man, yet to raiſe a doubt, whether (* as one writes) hee was more ſincere and entire then Ferdinando King of Spaine, vpon whom (ſaith that Authour) hee did handſomely beſtow the enuy of the death of Edward Plantagenet Earle of Warwicke. The life therefore of this Prince (according to rigour of law) being thus in his power, the King gently pardoned all the paines, but the loſſe of his head, which was cut off vpon a ſcaffold at Tower-hill, and then (another gracious fauour) his body was not buried in the Chappell of the Tower, or in any other common place, but at * Biſham by his Anceſtors. Iealous (ſaith * one) the King was ouer the greatneſſe of his Nobility, as remembring how himſelfe was ſet vp; and much more did this humour increaſe in him after hee had conflicted with ſuch Idols and Counterfeits as Lambert Simnel and Perkin Warbecke. The ſtrangeneſſe of which dangers made him thinke nothing ſafe. This Earle was the laſt heire-male of the blood, and ſurname of Plantagenet; whoſe race, as it was a long time glorious for giuing Kings to England, (euen from King Henry the ſecond) ſo in the end (chiefly for the Houſe of Yorke) it became hatefull (as it ſeemes) to God and man, for the moſt horrible and inextinguible deadly fewdes, murthers, perjuries, and other horrors committed within it ſelfe, which (as then not fully expiated) lay heauily vpon the head of this Earle, and finally threw open all thoſe Fences, which the poſſeſſion of Majeſtie and numeroſitie of iſſue had for ſundry ages caſt about it, letting in thereby the ſurname of Tydder, being but two deſcents Engliſh, and which now after three deſcents and fiue Princes, is alſo vaniſhed.

Now, among thoſe few great workes of peace which enſued their fire-brands of warre, wee muſt remember the marriage of Prince Arthur, with the Princeſſe of Spaine Lady Katherine: The interim from Warwicks death till then, brought forth a very great plague, whereof in London there are ſaid to haue dyed about thirtie thouſand. The King and Queene remooue to Callis in May, and returned in June. The maine * buſineſſe was to renew and ratifie the ſtate of amity, and negociations, betweene the Engliſh and the Duke of Burgundies Subjects. Shine alſo was burnt, and being new builded, called Richmond, for which, and the like, it will be fitteſt to haue recourſe to vulgar Annals.

(62) The Coaſt of State now ſeeming cleare from all thickning weather, Ferdinando and Iſabella King and Queene of Spaine, according to the points of agreement betweene them and King Henry, concerning their fourth Daughter the Lady Katherine (borne at Alcala de Finari, or Complutum) ſent her royally appointed in a goodly Fleet to England, there to fulfill in perſon, what hitherto had beene onely treated of, who after many difficulties tooke land at * Plimmouth in October. Ferdinando her Father was

For by his marriage with Iſabella, (ſole Siſter and heire to Henry the fourth King of Caſtile and Leon,) hee raigned in right of his Wife; and ioyntly with her, ouer thoſe two Kingdomes and their appurtenances, who together (ſaith * Marineus of Sicilia) did admirable things, and workes moſt holy. They * recouered the huge Citie and Kingdome of Granada, and part of Andaluzia from the Moores, after they had beene in violent poſſeſſion thereof ſeuen hundreth and foureſcore yeeres, and hauing purged thoſe places from the filth of Mahomets ſuperſtitions, built Churches to the honour of Ieſus Chriſt, by occaſion whereof Ferdinando was ſurnamed The Catholike King. The walles of the Citie of Granada at the time of the ſurrender, which (after about tenne yeeres warres) was by Voabdelis King thereof, made to Ferdinando and Iſabella, had * twelue miles in compaſſe, and in the ſame twelue Gates, and a thouſand Towers, encloſing ſeuen Hills couered with building, innumerable people, and ineſtimable riches, and the Spaniſh forces at this conqueſt were about 12000. Horſe, and one hundred thouſand foot. The ſaid King and Queene, beſides many other their mighty actions, did alſo firſt diſcouer America, by Chriſtopher Columbus, and thereby brought a whole new World to the notice of Chriſtendome. Iſabella her ſelfe, deſcended of the Blood-royall of England, being Daughter of Iohn the ſecond King of Caſtile and Leon, Sonne of Henry the third King of Caſtile and Leon, and of Katherine his wife, (daughter of * Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, third ſonne of our Edward the third of triumphall and neuer-dying memory) was a Lady, whoſe * like, the Chriſtian world had ſeldome any of that wiſdome, grauity, chaſtity, and of ſo laborious a deuotion, that * She did not onely day by day performe the Canonicall and hourely taske of prayers vſed by Prieſts, but many other, and brought vp her children accordingly.

(63) The Lady Katherine being about eighteene yeeres old, and borne of ſo great, ſo noble, ſo victorious and vertuous parents, is with juſt Majeſty and ſolemnitie openly * married in Pauls-Church to Arthur Prince of Wales, aged about fifteene yeeres, and eldeſt Sonne to Henry the ſeuenth, King of England, and of Elizabeth his Wife. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury, aſſiſted with nineteene Biſhops and Abbots, mytred, joyned their hands, and performed all the other Church Rites vpon that great day. The vulgar Annals can tell you the ſplendor and glory thereof, in Apparell, Iewels, Pageants, Banquets, Gueſts, and other Princely complements, the onely weightie buſineſſe of many weaker braines. A graue Lady (as ſome haue written) was laid in bed betweene the Bride and Bridegroome, to hinder actuall conſummation, in regard of the Princes greene eſtate of body; but others alledge many arguments to prooue that Matrimoniall performance was betweene them, howſoeuer her ſelfe, (when that afterward came in queſtion) * appealed to the conſcience of King Henry the eighth (her ſecond husband) if hee found her not a Maide. But Prince Arthur enjoyed his marriage a very ſhort while, for in Aprill following he died at Ludlow, being vnder ſixteene yeeres of age: being a Prince, in whoſe youth the lights of all noble vertues did clearely begin to ſhine. His aptneſſe to learne was almoſt incredible, for (by the report of his * Maſter) he had either learned without booke, or otherwiſe ſtudiouſly turned and reuolued with his owne hands and eyes theſe Authors following: In Grammar, Garin, Perot, Sulpicius, Gellius, and Valla: In Poëtrie, Homer, Virgil, Lucan, Ouid, Silius, Plautus, and Terence: In Oratory, Tullies Offices, Epiſtles, Paradoxes and Quintilian: In Hiſtory, Thucydides, Liuie, Cæſars Commentaries, Suetonius, Tacitus, Plinius, Valeriue Maximus, Saluſt, Euſebius. Wherein we haue beene particular, to ſignifie what Authors were then thought fit to be elementary and rudimentall vnto Princes; and by their example, to all of Noble or Gentle birth, whoſe ſuperficiall boldneſſe in bookes in theſe frothy daies, is become moſt ſcandalous and injurious to the honour and vſe of learning.

King Henrie weary of warres and tumults, and desirous to lay the beginnings of a long peace by most inward friendship with all his great neighbours, had concluded a match betweene Margaret his eldest Daughter, and Iames the fourth King of Scotland, the * assurance whereof was published in the February next before Prince Arthurs death at Pauls-Crosse; in reioycement whereof, Te Deum was sung, and other signes of publike ioy declared. The * Bishop of Rosse saith, that the Earle of Bothwell did openly hand-fast, or espouse the said faire Lady, in the name of King Iames at Pauls-Crosse, being Saint Pauls day. This contract was brought about in manner following. After that the storme of warre had (by mediation as before said) beene throughly laid betweene the two sister Nations, it chanced certaine of the Scots by their suspitious behauiour, and rough Phrases, to prouoke the Garrison of Norham-Castell to issue, who in the bickering slew and hurt some of them, and droue the rest away. King * Iames expostulates this violence very sharpely by letters with King Henry, who returned most satisfactory answers. Richard Fox Bishop of Durham (whose the men and Castell were) wrote also many deprecatory letters, humbly praying the Scottish King to accept amends, whereunto he in the end inclined, and hauing some matters of farre greater moment to impart, desired the Bishops presence in Scotland, (knowing his deepe wisdome and great grace with his Soueraigne) which King Henrie gladly assented vnto. The meeting was at Melrose, an Abbey of Cistertian Monkes, where the King abode, who hauing roundly vttered to the Bishop his offence conceiued for the breach of good termes at Norham-Castell, and yet being finally pleased to receiue satisfaction, hee then secretly discouered his whole minde, the summe whereof was, That the King of England would bee pleased to giue to him in marriage the Lady Margaret his eldest daughter, as a pledge of indissoluble amitie. The Bishop promised his best diligence, and accordingly, after his returne, laboured therein with King Henrie, who most gladly hearkned thereunto. Whereupon the Scottish King sent the Archbishop of Glasco, the Earle of Bothwell, and others, to demand the Lady in marriage. Their entertainement was hearty and princely. But when the proposition came to scanning at the Councell-Table, it had not currant passage at first: for there were who obiected as an inconuenience; That by this marriage the Crowne of England might come to the Scottish line, by the issue of Lady Margaret. Whereunto it is said, King Henrie made this answer, * What if it should? for if any such thing should happen, (which Omen God forbid) I see it will come to passe, that our Kingdome shall leese nothing thereby, because there will not bee an accession of England to Scotland, but contrarily of Scotland vnto England, as to that which is farre away the most noble Head of the whole Iland, seeing that which is lesse vseth to accrue to the ornament and honour of that which is much the greater, as Normandy heretofore came to bee vnder the dominion and power of the English our fore-fathers. When this was said, the whole boord of Councell receiued it as an Oracle, and it went cleare about, That Margaret should bee married to the King of Scotland. With this answer, and other instructions, the Scottish Ambassadors were sent home, who afterward returned into England with full authority and satisfaction to all Henries propositions, whereupon ensued the beforesaid publishment of assurances at Pauls-Crosse. It was a principall Article in this agreement: That no Englishman should enter Scotland, nor Scot into England, without commendatory Letters from their Soueraigne. Which Article was reputed a speciall meane to preserue the peace inuiolable.

(65) But ere the young Lady her selfe was conuaied into Scotland, her brother Prince Arthur died, and in * February next ensuing, their Mother also Queene Elizabeth, as shee lay in Child-bed within the Tower of London. The King, to repaire his mind with fresh Consolations, in aduancing his onely remaining Sonne, Henry Duke of Yorke, created him suddainely Prince of Wales, Earle of Chester and Flint, within few dayes after his Mothers decease. Thus was Arthurs losse supplied, howsoeuer. Henry made Prince, espoused soone after (* though with much reluctation) the Lady Katherine his elder Brothers widdow, * vpon the fiue and twentieth of Iune, at the Bishop of Salisburies house in Fleetstreete. And in this wise, by prouiding so worthy a wife for him, (though to say truth, her great Dower was was the chiefe motiue)the King thought that the eſtate of England was ſufficiently ſetled;wherefore conuerting his cares to the accompliſhment of affinitie with Scotland, hee moſt ſumptuouſly furniſhed his deareſt eldeſt Daughter for her iourney,and himſelfe in perſon trauelled from Richmond as farre with her as Coleweſton beſide Northampton, where his mother the Counteſſe lay: * after certaine daies ſpent in ſolace, the King gaue her his bleſſing, with fatherly counſell and exhortation, and committed the guard and conduct of her perſon principally to the Earles of Surrey and Northumberland, and to ſuch Ladies and Gentlewomen as were appointed to that ſeruice; a great company of Lords, Knights, Eſquires, and men of Marke attending them as farre as Berwicke. At S^t. Lamberts Church in Lamer Moore within Scotland, the King attended by the principall of his Nobles, receiued her from the hands of the Earle of Northumberland, and the next yeere after, married her at Edenborough, in the preſence of all his Nobilitie. The King gaue great entertainment to the Engliſh, and ſhewed them juſting and other paſtimes, after the Scottiſh faſhion. The Scottiſh-men (ſaith * the Biſhop of Roſſe) were not behind, but farre aboue the Engliſh men, both in apparell, rich Iewels, and maſſie Chaines, many Ladies hauing their habiliments ſet with Gold-ſmith worke,garniſht with Pearle and Stone of price, with gallant and well-trapped horſes. Diuers Ladies alſo and young Gentle-women of England, attending Queene Margaret, remained there, and were well married to certaine Noble-men of Scotland, whoſe progenie liues honourably there euen at theſe daies. The effect of this marriage is grauely deſcribed by the ſame Biſhop in theſe words: There was perfect peace and ſincere amitie betweene the two Realmes of England and Scotland a long time after. And verily, during the life of King Henry the ſeuenth, no cauſe of breach was miniſtred by either of the Princes, but they continued in great loue and friendſhip, and mutuall ſocietie, contracting of marriages, continuall enterchange of Merchandize betwixt the Subjects of both the Realmes, as they had beene ALL vnder the obedience of ONE PRINCE; where-through, Iuſtice, Policy and Riches did flouriſh and abound throughout the whole Ile of Albion. And of this marriage is Iames the ſixth deſcended, being That ONE PRINCE, vnder whoſe obedience ALL are now gouerned, as vnder the ſole and lawfull lineall Monarch of Great-Britaine: for this Iames the 4. had Iſſue Iames the 5. he had Iſſue Queene Mary, ſhee had Iſſue our preſent Soueraigne, the great Grand-childe of the ſaid Queene Margaret, eldeſt Daughter of King Henry the 7.

(66) Which effects of peace and riches, as they could not but be comfortable to ſo wiſe a King as Henry, they being the fruit as it were of his owne juſt labours; ſo let vs now obſerue the laſt worldly cares of his Raigne,and vpon what objects hee fixed his minde, freed from the awe of open challenges of the Crowne,and from throwes at his maine, which with what art, valour and felicitie, hee at firſt atchieued,and with how great hazards, troubles, and bloody buſineſſes,he brought it to ſuch paſſe, that neighbour-Kings reputed it ſafe to enter-marry with his Family, wee haue already heard: Two principall points tooke vp the laſt Scenes of his life; for the reſt of his time he wholly employed, either in the ſeruice of Almighty God (wherein hee was ſo diligent, that euery day he was preſent, after the deuotions of thoſe times, at two or three Maſſes, oftentimes hearing godly Sermons,) or in building, wherewith hee kept his ſenſes buſied. The one of the two chiefe points, was, to watch ouer the waies of his Wiues kindred (the remaining branches of the turbulent and vnfortunate Houſe of Yorke) whoſe growth & greatneſſe he ſuppoſed might at ſome time or other ouer-top his own; the other was, vnder opinion of juſtice, to increaſe his treaſure out of the common purſes, whereby hee ſeemed onorous to many, and ſomewhat obſcured the brightneſſe of his former glory, at leaſt-wiſe diminiſhed his opinion with the generalitie. Concerning his courſes holden with his wiues kindred, (the laterall iſſues and ſtaddles of the Plantagenets) it fell out thus; which (by * occaſion of the accidentall landing of Philip King of Spaine at this time, whereby the * Earle of Suffolkes taking was procured) wee thought it beſt to handle here together. Edmund de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, ſonne to John Duke of Suffolke, and of Elizabeth Siſter to King Edward the fourth)in the ſixteenth yeere of King Henries Raigne, wilfully ſlew slew a common person in his fury. Henry not sorry to haue occasion of encreasing his popularity, by presenting so great a person to exemplary justice, and in the same act to blemish the honour of a man, whose quality was to him suspected, caused him for the same to bee arraigned. The fact hee was perswaded to confesse, and thereupon had pardon. The Earle neuertheless, as a Prince of the blood, holding himselfe disgraced, by hauing beene seene a Prisoner at the Kings-Bench-Barre, fled the Land discontented, and went to his Aunt the Dutchesse Dowager of Burgundie; but within a while after, being fairely reconciled, hee returned. After which, notwithstanding, whether it were by reason of debt (the certaine attendant of vaine-spirited, and base-braue-minded Courtiers) whereinto he had deepely throwne himselfe, for his furniture, at the celebration of his cousin Prince Arthurs marriage, or for that the restlesse spirit of enuy in the Dutchesse had preuailed, hee taking his Brother with him, fled againe the next yeere after. The King, who had pardoned his life, seemed now to repent his clemency, * though it is plaine, he spared him of purpose, till he might discouer more of a conspiracy which he knew was in hammering; but his flight troubled him not a little, knowing the violent humour of that Lord, and remembring to what a dangerous and bloody issue his Brother the Earle of Lincolne had once already brought things at the Battell of Stoke in the beginning of his raigne.

An office vnworthy of Knighthood; neither can any good spirit in the world stoope it selfe to such double-faced employment, which besides the treacherous dissimulations thereof, cannot but be accompanied with wilfull impieties. For who is admitted into trust vpon a contrary side, without inuocations of Gods holy name, protestations, adiurations, oathes, the vtmost assurances which man can giue to man, to beget a conuenient affiance in his sincerity? But by this stratagem the King ransackes the bosomes and cabinets of his aduersaries, discouering their designes and hopes. (68) This so round and quicke dealing with the Earles complices and fauourers, startled his shallow and raw inuentions, and made their whole bulke to swarue and splinter; but the King rested not so; for vpon the Sunday before the feast of SS. Simon and Iude, in the same yeere, of the said executions, there was published at Pauls Crosse, by the Kings procurement from Pope Alexander the sixt, a Bull of * Excommunication and curse against the said Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Curson, and fiue other persons by speciall name, and generally all other which ayded the Earle against the King, to the disturbance of the kingdome. Thus did the moſt prudent Henrie purſue his enemies, not only with ſecret countermines and open weapons of Law, before they could aſſemble to make any ſhew, but alſo with ſpirituall lightning; which doubtleſſe, had they beene vpon iuſt cauſe, and by lawfull authority fulminated, ought infinitely to be dreaded of good Chriſtians, becauſe (as Saint Paul ſaith) they deliuer ouer to Satan. Sir Robert Curſon was named, of purpoſe, to make the Earle ſecure of him; which may well be called a perillous, if not a prophane deuice, though his Holineſſe were made the inſtrument thereof. Neither did the King leaue here, for by his Letters and Meſſengers hee ſo preuailed with Pope * Alexander, as hee decreed by his Bull, That no perſon ſhould afterward haue priuiledge of Sanctuary, who had once taken the ſame, and come forth againe: and that, * if any Sanctuarieman ſhould afterward commit any murther, robbery, ſacriledge, treaſons, &c. he ſhould by Lay force be drawne thence to ſuffer due puniſhment. This was of great vſe to the King, and preſerued many Subiects from precipitation, for the abuſe of Sanctuaries had beene an efficient of many troubles. But the ſame Pope (hauing ſent Iohn Giglis his Receiuer, to gather money in England) ſhewed himſelfe much more fauourable to ſuch as perpetrated thoſe ſaid hainous offences, as alſo, Vſury, Symony, Rapines, Adulteries, or whatſoeuer offences, (excepting certaine offences againſt the Pope and Clergie, &c.) when he ſent a * Bull of Pardons (for money) to all ſuch offendors in England; diſpenſing alſo thereby, with ſuch, as kept away, or by any fraud had gotten the goods of other men, which they ſhould now retaine ſtill without ſcruple of conſcience, ſo as they paid a ratable portion thereof vnto his Holineſſe Receiuers. Sir Robert Curſon (though before accurſed by the Pope) returnes, when he ſaw fit time, into England, and withall into wonted fauour with his Soueraigne. The Earle, ſeeing himſelfe thus ſtript of all hope to doe much harme, wandred about Germanie and France to finde repoſe, but in the end quite tyred, hee put himſelfe into the grace and protection of Philip then in Flanders, who by the death of Iſabella was King of Spaine, in right of Ioan his wife, eldeſt daughter of Ferdinando and Iſabella; where he remayned in baniſhment, till King Philip was driuen by tempeſt in the moneth of Ianuary into England, as hee meant to haue paſſed thorow the ſleeue, or Engliſh Ocean, into Spaine, there to take poſſeſſion of that Kingdome, and other the appurtinances.

(69) The chiefe Ship of the Nauie-Royall, wherein the King was, and two other (all the reſt being ſcattered by the fury of the weather into ſeuerall places and other Ports of England,) thruſt into Harbour at * Falmouth. Himſelfe weary and ſicke with the violent toſſings of the Sea (whereunto hee had neuer, as it ſeemes, beene vſed,) would needs come on ſhoare, and refreſh his ſpirits, though the principall men about him diſſwaded that courſe, as fore-ſeeing it would procure a longer ſtay, then the nature of their occaſions would perhaps well beare. And ſo indeed it fell out, for being now in another Princes (though his friends) dominions, where hee had no power ouer himſelfe, nor others, and the rumour of arriuall ſtirring the men in authoritie there-about; Sir Thomas Trenchard Knight with the ſudden forces of the countrey, not knowing what the matter might bee, came thither, and vnderſtanding the Royall qualitie of the perſon, inuited him with all humble humanitie to his houſe, and forth-with diſpatched Poſtes to Court; not long after Sir Iohn Caro Knight, (with a great troupe of armed men) repaired alſo, purſuing the like humble intreaties; which the King, fearing conſtraint, becauſe they were but ſubjects, and durſt not let him paſſe without their Lord and Maſters leaue neceſſarily yeelded vnto. Vpon notice of this mightie Princes caſuall arriuall, King Henry preſently commanded the Earle of Arundel to entertaine him till himſelfe could come, who very magnificently did ſo, with * three hundred Horſes by Torchlight; and in the meane-while King Henry himſelfe prepares. Philip perceiuing, that whatſoeuer ſpeed his affaires required, yet now there was no remedy but to ſtay, thought not good to expect his approach, but to preuent it, and came vpon the ſpurre to Windſore, that he might be gone againe the ſooner, after whom Queene Ioan his Wife came leiſurably. The reſt of this entertainement, becauſe it hath matter of weight, and is well ſet downe by Polydor Virgil, it ſhall ſuffice vs to follow his his footsteps. At Windsore, the two Kings, after long and seuerall discourses, began to conferre about renewing their league. Henry required that Edmund Earle of Suffolke might bee deliuered vp into his power: which Philip denyed to be a thing that he could doe, as holding it most vnreasonable to be the Author of his death, whom he had taken into Protection: but when at the last hee found, that no excuse nor reason could satisfie, for that, Henry voluntarily offered to saue the Earles life, he promised to do therein what he desired, and presently tooke order for his sending ouer. According whereunto, King Henry (to draw out the time, till he had the wished prey) conuayed King Philip to London, to shew him the head City of his Kingdome, out of which, after a little stay, he re-conducted him. The Earle in the meane time, who conceiued horrour at the first newes of King Philips landing in England, as fatall to him, and resolued that no hope was longer to be reposed in the faith of forraine Princes, came ouer not vnwillingly, presuming that after pardon of life, he might also in time regaine his liberty; or if that hope fayled, yet should hee at least-wise obtaine to die, and be buried in his Countrey. But King Philip and his Queene, hauing feasted with her Sister the Princesse of Wales, departed England. The Earle was brought thorow Flanders to Callis vpon the sixteenth of March, and landed at Douer vpon the foure and twentieth of the same, conuayed thither by Sir Henry Wyat, and Sir Iohn Wiltshire, with threescore men in armour of the Garrison of Callis; and at Douer Sir Iohn Louel and others receiuing him, guarded him safe to the Tower of London. King Philip, not long after his landing in Spaine, deceased, being not thirtie yeeres old. That tempest which draue him into England, was holden by the people as prodigious; for it blew downe the Golden-Eagle from the famous Spire of Pauls-Steeple (being of Copper, richly ouer-guilt, of fortie pounds weight, in length foure foot, and in breadth three,) which also in the fall thereof, brake and battered the signe of the Blacke Eagle, in Pauls-Church-yard, in the place where now the Schoole-house stands. This accident euen then made some conjecture, that the Emperour Maximilian (whose Imperiall Ensigne the Eagle is) should suffer some losse accordingly (saith Polydor) as indeed he did by the death of King Philip his sonne. Which (if any superstitiously delight in Calculations of that blind nature) we may well paralell with that * lightning which strook the Letter C. out of Cæsar in the inscription of Cæsar Augustus his Statue; whereupon it was gathered, that Augustus should liue but one hundreth daies after, and then bee called a God) (Æsar the remaining syllables so signifying in the old Hetruscan tongue,) which accordingly hapned.

* Suet. in Aug. cap. 97.

(70) Thus was the Earle of Suffolke brought backe, and the King anchored his quiet at the safe custody of his person within the Tower. The other worldly point wherein he chiefely bestowed his ages care, was to gather money, though by courses seeming very grieuous and full of bitternesse; the too-griping greedinesse, and too-profuse lauishnesse of money in Princes, being both alike offensiue to a well-settled estate. Some excuse his doings herein (amongst whom Polydor is chiefe) as not proceeding from any deprauation or vncorrected affection of his nature; but from an opinion and fore-cast of generall profit: because a Princes humour of gathering, tendeth, though with distaste of particular men, to the good publique, whereas his profusenesse, though with some particular mens profit, endeth in the impouerishment of the whole. And Henry himselfe protested (saith Polydor) hee did it not for loue of money, but with a purpose to bridle the fierce minds of a Nation bred vp among factions: though they (saith the same Author) who felt the smart, and were wounded by his Instruments,) * cried out, They were not so much the darts of seueritie, which did hit them, as of auarice. Yet Polydors Apologie may be current: for it is not to be doubted, but that such vse the King might propound himselfe; and yet withall, we can hardly finde any commendable root thereof, the wayes being so importune and harsh, by which he raised money. Let vs heare in this point the obseruatiue * Knight. Of nature (saith he) Henry coueted to accumulate treasure, which the people (into whom there is infused, for the preseruation of Monarchies, a naturall desire to discharge their Princes, though it bee with the vnjust charge of their Counsellors and Ministers) did impute vnto Cardinall Morton, and Sir Reinald Bray, who (as it afterward appeared) as Counſellors of ancient authoritie with him, did ſo ſound his humour, as neuertheleſſe they tempered it. Where it is truly ſaid, it afterward appeared: for till they were gone to account to God, and his feare for the maine quite baniſhed, the King did not let looſe the reines to his immoderate deſire of hauing, which yet was not more ſinfull, then the meanes vnder him practiſed, were odious. For * Empſon and Dudley that followed, being perſons that had no reputation with him, otherwiſe then the ſeruile following of his owne humors, gaue him way, and ſhaped him meanes to thoſe extremities, whereby himſelfe was touched with remorſe at his death, and which his Succeſſor diſauowed. And this we take to be a true judgement. To be particular in the recitall of things worthy to dye in forgetfulneſſe, is not onely to recite, but in a ſort to teach them alſo, as ſome, who by broad inuectiues, haue as it were read a lecture of thoſe vices, againſt which they haue pretended to inueigh. But publike and ſhamefull Arts may more ſafely bee deliuered. The inſtruments whom the King ſet on worke, (or who perhaps ſet the King on worke) were * two Lawyers, Richard Empſon, (afterward knighted) and Edmund Dudley Eſquier; their imployment was to call the richer ſubiect into queſtion for breach of old penall lawes, long before diſcontinued and forgotten, whereby they brake in vpon the people, as it were at vnaware, like a kinde of authorized robbers, masked vnder the pretext of ſeruice for the King, and the names of Delators or Promotors, a * familiar ſickneſſe in the times of ancient Tyrannies. But the courſes to execute their employment, were voide of all conſcience and colour. For one of them was to * out-law perſons ſecretly, and then to ſeize their eſtates, driuing them to chargefull compoſitions with the King, and heauy bribes to the Authors of their trouble. More deteſtable was another practice of theirs: For * there were falſe Iurors and Ring-leaders of falſe Iurors, who would neuer giue any verdict againſt the will of their Patrons, the ſaid Empſon and Dudley; ſo that if any durſt ſtand out vpon triall, the deſtiny of their cauſes was ſquared forth by the leaden rule of thoſe fellowes conſciences; which to be a truth, the expiatory puniſhment which King Henry the eighth tooke of them in the firſt yeere of his Raigne, doth clearely conuince. By theſe meanes many honeſt and worthy Subjects were rigorouſly fined, impriſoned, or otherwiſe afflicted, which filled the Land with ſorrow and repinings. Among very many others thus abuſed, Sir William Capell Alderman of London was eminent, as from whom, in the tenth yeere of the Kings Raigne, had beene ſcruzed, vnder the colour of moth-eaten and vn-reuiued Lawes, aboue ſixteene hundreth pounds ſterling, and was now againe plaide at afreſh, and another hand drawne vpon him for two thouſand pounds, which becauſe hee would not pay, he was by Dudley commanded priſoner to the Tower; but by the death of the King which enſued, all ſuch Priſoners were releaſed. If any perhaps will ſlight the hard vſage extended to Citizens, and to the like, they are vnwiſe therein, neither thinke as Patriots ought. For though it may ſo fall out that the perſonall vexation of ſome few, merits no great pitie; yet the example is peſtilent; and it is a part of the cunning, to chooſe out at firſt ſuch for patternes, as vpon whoſe perſons leaſt compaſſion may fall, which examples may afterward bee extended to whomſoeuer. Theſe reuels and rages againſt the wealthier ſort continued, till it pleaſed GOD to ſting the Kings heart with juſt compunction, toward the horror of his death; who had the fauour from Heauen, as to lye ſicke of a conſuming diſeaſe, which waſted him by ſuch inſenſible degrees, as gaue him the vſe of his whole ſelfe (as it were) till the laſt gaſpe, whereby hee had meanes to recollect himſelfe, after thoſe many ſoule-wounding aſſaults which attend Regall greatneſſe, and to ſubmit his thoughts to ſuch ghoſtly admoniſhments (touching another life) whereunto in daies of health, the hearts or eares of great Princes are ſeldome attentiue.

(71) About the yeere of his death, hauing vnderſtood that Lewis King of France, deſpairing of Iſſue-Male, had annulled the Contracts made betweene Charles King of Spaine, (ſonne of the late King Philip, and afterward elected Emperour by the name of Charles the fift) and the Lady Claudia his eldeſt Daughter, whom hee newly betrothed to Francis of Valois Dolphin of France, and Duke of Angoleſme; King Henry (whoſe care for preſeruation of the common common quiet, and good of his Countrey, by forraine alliances, was euer wholly in him and awake) thought it a faire occasion for him to match his younger daughter the Lady Mary. The French King, to haue the aduice of Iames the fourth King of Scots, in the bestowing the said Madam Claudia his eldest Daughter, had before sent Bernard Steward Lord Dobignie, and the President of Tholouz, Ambassadours for that purpose; who finally in effect receiued this answer: * That the said King Iames thought it best that his eldest Daughter should be married within his owne Realme of France; for if shee were married vpon any forraine Prince, it might giue colour to claime title to the said Realme afterward. And if he did marry her at home, rather to him the said Francis, whom hee had appointed to succeed, then any other. Which resolution was very acceptable to King Lewis, because it jumped with his owne purpose, and it was followed accordingly. King Henry therefore hearing that King Charles might be obtained, so pursued the point * by the prudent managing of Richard Foxe (now Bishop of Winchester) his Ambassador, that King Charles his Ambassadours comming out of Flanders, where he was educated, and meeting him at Callis, the affaire was opened, disputed, concluded, and the Lady Mary, then about ten yeeres of age, (as King Charles himselfe) was by solemne contract assured to him for Wife.

(72) Now therefore his Sonne Henry Prince of Wales, being heire of the Crowne, and married; his eldest Daughter, the Lady Margaret, Queene of Scotland; the Lady Mary his youngest, prouided for so highly (though in the end it came to nothing) all likelihood of perill by Competitors, or busie Factionists, buried in the Tower, by the imprisonment of Edmund Earle of Suffolke; his people tractable and calme; his coffers full, and the state of things ripe for a successour: Death (the executioner of the Almighties sentence,) was ready to discharge him of the prison of his flesh. Before hee departed, * Well disposed persons tendering the health of his soule, did both in Sermons, and otherwise, informe him of the exclamations against Informers; Wherefore hee of his blessed disposition, granted to all men generall pardons, certaine onely excepted. In his life-time hee founded the goodly Hospitall of the Sauoy, built sixe religious Houses for Franciscan Fryers, three of them for Obseruants, and the other three for Conuentuals. Of his building also was Richmond-Palace, and that most beautifull peece, the Chappell at Westminster, the one, the place of his death, and the other, of his buriall: which formes of more curious and exquisite building, he and Bishop Foxe, first (as is reported) learned in France, and thence brought with them into England. He died about the age of fifty two yeeres, vpon the two and twentieth of * Aprill, hauing raigned twentie three yeeres and eight moneths. A right noble, wise, victorious, and renowned King, and one whose pietie would haue beene farre more eminent then all his other vertues, if from the beginning, the malignant qualitie of the times would haue permitted him to liue in quiet. He specially honoured the remembrance of that Saint-like Man, Henry the sixt, the founder of his Family, and Propheticall fore-teller of that fortune which now he dyed seised of, whom also he laboured to haue * Canonized for a Saint, but that Pope Iulio held that honour at too high a rate. It is reckoned by some Writers * of that age, among his principall glories, that three Popes, Alexander the sixth, Pius the third, and Iulius the second, did in their seuerall times, with authoritie and consent of the Cardinals, elect and choose him for Chiefe Defensor of Christs Church, before all other Christian Princes. In his last Will and Testament, after the disposition of his Soule and Body, he deuised and willed, Restitution should be made of all such monyes as had vnjustly beene leuied by his Officers. A most pious and truly Christian care, whereby also appeareth, that he hoped the wrongs done vnder him, were not so enormous nor innumerable, but that they might fall within the possibilitie of redresse. The description of his whole man, is had in the beginning of his life, and the course thereof described in his Actions. There remaine of his wisedome many effects, and those as his fame, likely to continue for euer.

(71) Elizabeth, the first Childe Legitimate, and eldest Daughter of King Edward the Fourth, was at the age of nineteene, vpon the eighteenth of Ianuary, and yeere of Christ Iesus 1485. married vnto King Henry the Seuenth, whereby were vnited the long-contending Families of Lancaster and Yorke, and the Roses Red and White joyned into one, to the great joy of the English Subjects. Shee was crowned at Westminster vpon the fiue and twentieth of Nouember, the third of her Husbands Raigne, and of Grace 1487. Shee was his Wife eighteene yeeres, and twentie foure dayes, and died in Childbed in the Tower of London, the eleuenth of February, euen the day of her owne Natiuitie, the eighteenth of her Husbands Raigne, and yeere of our Saluation, 1503. and is buried at Westminster in the most magnificent Chappell and rich Monument of Copper and Gilt, where shee with her husband lieth entombed.

His Issue.

(72) Arthur, the eldest Sonne of King Henry the Seuenth, and of Queene Elizabeth his Wife, was borne at Wincheſter the twentieth day of September, the yeere of Grace, one thousand foure hundred eightie six, and the second of his Fathers Raigne. In whose fifth yeere hee was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester, and at the age of fifteene yeeres, one moneth and twentie fiue dayes, vpon the foureteenth of Nouember, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand fiue hundred and one, espoused the Lady Katherine, Daughter to Ferdinando King of Spaine, shee being then about eighteene yeeres of age, in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, London; and presently sent into Wales, the better to gouerne that Principalitie by his owne Presence, enjoyed his marriage-bedde onely foure moneths, and nineteene dayes, departing this life at Ludlow the second of Aprill, the yeere of our Lord, one thousand fiue hundred and two, of his Fathers Raigne seuenteene, and of his owne age fifteene yeeres, sixe moneths, and thirteene dayes. His body, with all due funerall solemnities, was buried in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Maries in Worcester, where, in the South-side of the Quire hee remaineth entombed in Touch, or Iette, without any remembrance of him by picture.

(73) Henry, the second Sonne of King Henry the seuenth, and of Queene Elizabeth, was borne at Greenwitch in the Countie of Kent, the two and twentieth of Iune, in the yeere of Grace, one thousand foure hundred ninetie and one, beeing the seuenth of his Fathers Raigne. In his Infancy he was created Duke of Yorke, and Marshall of England, and so trained vp in his youth to literature, as hee was rightly accounted the best learned Prince in Europe, and, by the death of his Brother, succeeded his Father in all his Dominions; whose Raigne and Acts are presently to be related.

(74) Edmund, the third Sonne of King Henry, and of Queene Elizabeth, was borne in the yeere of Christ, one thousand foure hundred ninetie fiue, and in his young yeeres was created Duke of Sommerset, which Title he no long time enjoyed, being taken away by death at Bishops-Hatfield, before hee attained fully to fiue yeeres of age, the yeere of Grace, one thousand foure hundred ninetie and fiue, and fifteenth of his Fathers Raigne: his Body lyeth interred at Saint Peters in Westminster.

(75) Margaret, the eldest Daughter of King Henry, and of Lady Elizabeth his Queene, was borne the nine and twentieth day of Nouember, the yeere of Christ 1489. and fifth of her Fathers Raigne; she at the age of foureteene was married vnto Iames the fourth King of Scotland, the yeere of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred and three, vnto whom shee bare Iames the fifth, Arthur and Alexander, and a Daughter: which last three, dyed all of them young; and, after the death of King Iames (being slaine at Flodden-field in fight against the English,) shee was re-married vnto Archibald Douglas Earle of Anguisse, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand fiue hundred and foureteene, vnto whom shee bare Margaret, afterward espoused vnto Matthew Earle of Lennox, Father by her of the Lord Henry, who died at the age of nine moneths, and lyeth interred in the vpper end of the Chancell in the Parish-Church of Stepney neere London, vpon whose Graue is engrauen in Brasse, as followeth:

Heere lyeth Henry Steward, Lord Darley, of the age of 3. quarters of a yeere, late Sonne and Heire of Matthew Steward Earle of Lennox and Lady Margaret his Wife, which Henrie deceased the

Her second Sonne was Henry Lord Dernley a Noble Prince; and reputed for person one of the goodliest Gentlemen of Europe, who married Mary Queene of Scotland, the Royall Parents of the most Royall Monarch Iames the first, King of great Britaine, and of the Britaine World. And her third Sonne was Charles Earle of Lennox, Father vnto Lady Arbella.

(76) Elizabeth, the second Daughter of King Henry and Lady Elizabeth his Queene, was borne the second day of Iuly, one thousand foure hundred ninety two, and died the foureteenth of September, and yeere of Christ, one thousand foure hundred ninety fiue, and is interred at Westminster.

(77) Mary, the third blossome of the Imperiall Rose-tree of England, was first Wife to Lewis King of France, who liued not long after, and died without Issue by her. Her second Husband was that Martiall and pompous Gentleman, Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke.

(78) Katherine, fourth Daughter of this seuenth Henry, and of Elizabeth his Queene, was borne vpon Candlemas-day, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand fiue hundred and three, and in the eighteenth yeere of her Fathers Raigne, who was called vnto a farre better Kingdome within a short while after.

CHAPTER XXI.

An. Dom. 1509.

THE rich and wiſe King (Henrie the ſeuenth) gone (as is ſaid) the way of all fleſh, his Sonne bearing the ſame name, a moſt magnanimous and heroicall Prince, ſucceeded in his Throne ouer all his Dominions, as the onely true heire vnto the Crowne, by both the Houſes of Lancaſter and Yorke. His birth was at Greenwich, in the yeere of Grace, 1491. the twentieth two of Iune: and his youth ſo trained vp in literature, that he was accounted the moſt learned Prince of all Chriſtendome, indued indued with parts moſt befitting a King, both in lineaments of body, and liberality of minde, beſides his ripe knowledge in politike affaires, and was made the more agreeable to the affections of men, by the conſideration of his flouriſhing age, as hauing not attained vnto nineteene at his fathers death. In his infancy he was created Duke of Yorke; at twelue yeeres (his Brother deceaſed) Prince of Wales, and at eighteene became ſole Monarch of the Land, when at Weſtminſter vpon Sunday the twenty fift of Iune, euen the feſtiuall of Saint Iohn Baptiſt, and yeere of Chriſt Ieſus, 1509. hee with his beauteous Queene Katherine receiued their Crownes at the hands of William Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury, no Prince giuing better hopes vnto iuſtice, or ſeeking the wealth of his ſubiects more then himſelfe.

(2) His Councellors hee choſe of the graueſt Diuines, and the wiſeſt Nobility, with whom hee not onely often ſate, to the great encreaſe of his politicke experience; but would alſo yeeld his authority to their graue and farre in-ſeeing wiſedomes: Of whom the plaints of Petitioners were ſo mouingly regarded, that Proclamations went forth, with promiſe of reſtitution, to them that had beene wronged by Dudley or Empſon, two perſons that had abuſed the authority of K. Henry his Father, by enriching their owne coffers, with the vtter vndoing of many better ſubiects. Theſe men, King Henrie the ſeuenth had made his Inſtruments for the finding out of offenders in his penall Statutes, themſelues being learned in the Lawes, and apt enough to execute their Commiſſions to the full: for, by their daily informations and recouering of fines, they digged and brought a ſiluer Mine into the Kings Exchequer, ſome veines whereof by the way, ranne alſo into their owne coffers, to the great vexation of all, and vtter vndoing of many; whereat the Noblemen grudged, the Gentility repined, the Commons lamented, and all of them felt the teeth of theſe rauening Wolues: But the Father-King departed, and his Sonne ſet on his Throne; the complaints of the oppreſſed ſo oppreſſed the King and his Councell, that Dudley and Empſon were ſent priſoners to the Tower, and both of them by Parliament attainted of Treaſon.

(3) Edmund Dudley by deſcent was a Gentleman, and by profeſſion a Lawyer, hauing both wit and words and will; had he not abuſed both, to his owne deſtruction. Richard Empſon his inferiour by birth, was the ſon of a poore Sieue-maker, but yet had he ſtepped before him to the degree of a Knight: Theſe night-ſprung Muſhrumps that ſucked the earths fatneſſe, from farre better plants then themſelues, ſaw not the many hands ready to plucke them vp by the rootes, when the ſeaſon ſhould ſerue to cleare the Land of ſuch weeds: for albeit they had their diſcharge vnder the Kings owne hand to doe what they did, and their ſeruice knowne Crowne-ſeruice, a matter impugnable, yet no ſooner were they left to ſtand vpon their owne baſis, but that they felt the weight of their done wrongs too importunable for them any longer to beare; for ſo importune were al degrees againſt them, that Dudley forthwith in Guild-hall London was arraigned and condemned to dye: and King Henrie in progreſſe, (through the cry of the people) could take no pleaſure, till hee had ſent for Empſon into Northamptonſhire, where among them he was arraigned, and receiued ſentence of death, which was ſo deſired and followed, as to ſatisfie his Subiects, the King ſent a ſpeciall writ for their executions, which with great ioy of all was performed vpon Tower-hill, by taking from them their heads; when they left their riches to bee ſpent by others, and their names to remaine vpon Record for the Caterpillers of thoſe times: whoſe like, if any ſuch liue, ſhall leaue their hatefull remembrance to the like ſtaines of reproachfull infamy, how pleaſing ſoeuer the promotion ſo gotten in their owne eyes ſhall ſeeme, or the employments in their ſelfe-conceits accounted profitable to the State.

(4) This iuſtice of King Henry wanne him great praiſe of his people, and his charity extended towards London, when that Citie was ſore diſtreſſed with famine, by ſending ſixe hundred quarters of corne, great loue; ſo that neuer any King entred his Raigne with better hopes then himſelfe. That his perſon was tall, is not to be doubted, though not like vnto Sauls, as ſome haue alledged, whoſe report is, that at the ſiege of Bulloigne, hee was higher by the head then any in his Campe, and euery ioynt proportionable to ſo Royall a ſtature: but that hee was ſtrong, his many Iuſts and Tilts, and fights at Tournay, (moſt dangerouſly

(5) His glory thus mounted the Trophie of fame, and young Henry the onely Morning-Starre in this Weſterne Orbe; Pope Iulius the ſecond, fearing the further incroach of the French, who then had entred into ſome part of Italy, thought this Prince the ſtrongeſt pillar whereunto to truſt, and the fitteſt Carde to trumpe the French King, well knowing the Title that the Engliſh Kings had vnto France, and the readineſſe of his Subiects to forward that way: whereupon writing his Letters vnto King Henrie, complained againſt Lewis the French King, and twelfth of that name, who neither (as he alledged) eſteeming of God, good fame, nor conſcience, detained the reuenewes of the Clergie, ſupported the Cardinall William to aſpire the Papacy, aided in the ſiege of Bonen Alfonſo of Ferrara, and the Benteuoly, both traitors to the Papall Sea, where hee intended to lay the foundation of his Empire, to vſurpe all Italy, beſought him for the pitty of our Sauiour, and by the vertue of his famous Anceſtors, (for I vſe the words of the Popes briefe) that neuer forſooke the Church of God in diſtreſſe, and by the filiall obedience, the ſtrongeſt bond, to enter into the holy league, they hauing elected him againſt Lewis, Caput fœderis Italici.

The Scottiſh King likewiſe, in caſe of Andrew Barton ſlaine in his Piracies (as the Engliſh alledged) by the Admirall of England, accounted the truce broken, and ſought the reuenge vpon the Borders adioyning. Againſt theſe two Nations young Henry at once prepared, and happily obtained faire victories againſt both: but the ſucceſſe of the one, (though not following preciſely the time) wee meane to relate, before wee enter diſcourſe of the other.

Battell of Spurs.

An. Dom. 1513. Auguſt. 24.

(9) Then was the battery brought ſo neere their walls, that many breaches were therein made, and the Towne by compoſition yeelded vnto the King; whereupon the Earle of Shrewsbury was ſent to ſee all things ſafe, who ſtucke vpon the higheſt Turret the Banner of Saint George, and tooke the Oath of Alleagiance of all the French Citizens, to acknowledge King Henry their ſupreme Lord: This done, the King as a Conquerour entreth Terwin, ſent thence their Ordnance, diſmounted the Turrets, caſt downe the walls, filled vp the ditches, and fired the Towne, excepting onely the Cathedrall Church and Biſhops Palace.

(10) Then was the ſiege remooued vnto Tournay: about which Citie King Henry commanded diuers Trenches to be caſt, and placed his Ordnance to ſuch aduantage, that none might enter in, or come out of the ſame. Into this Towne a great number of the French from from the Countries adjoyning had lately fled, relying much vpon the ſtrength and ſafety of the place, which indeede had euer beene accounted ſo inuincible, that this ſentence was engraued ouer one of the gates: Iannes ton me à perden ton pucellage, Thou haſt neuer loſt thy maiden-head: Notwithſtanding, it was yeelded vp vnto Henry with ten thouſand pounds ſterling for the Citizens redemption, who to the number of foureſcore thouſand, then tooke their oathes to become his true Subjects, and foure of their principall bare vp the Canopy, vnder which the King in triumphwiſe entred, hauing borne before him his Sword, Axe, Speare, and other abiliments of warre, euery Citizen holding a ſtaffe-Torch for his light. The ſafe keeping of this City the King committed to Sir Edward Poynings, Knight of the Order of the Garter, whom hee there made his Lieutenant, and ordained Thomas Wolſey his Almoner the Biſhop of Tournay. The yeere now ſpent, and ſeaſon vnfit for the field, a ſurceaſe from warre was determined vntill the next Spring; whereupon all were ſhipped for England, with full payment, and praiſe, but Terwin and Tournay ſtucke heauily vpon the French mens hearts.

(11) King Lewis thus endammaged in his owne Dominions, thought it beſt policy to pay like for like, to which end at the firſt attempts againſt Terwin, hee ſollicited Iames the fourth of that name, King of Scotland (though brother by marriage vnto King Henry of England) to diſturbe the peace of his Subjects, that ſo he might be drawn out of France; which Iames for his part put preſently in practice: for writing his letters to Henry in the French Kings behalfe, charged him with breach of Truce, both in the caſe of his Scots ſlaine at the Sea, as alſo againſt his Confederates the Duke of Gelder, and King of France, againſt which laſt hee deſired him to deſiſt, otherwiſe he ſhould be forced to reuenge the Frenches wrongs vpon his Engliſh: and to giue Letters of Mart to recouer the loſſes of his Subjects.

(12) King Henry a Prince of a Majeſticall ſpirit, moſt highly offended at theſe his Brothers requeſts, and threats, was ſo farre ouer-gone with fury and rage, that Lions King at Armes the bringer, was thereby ſomewhat daunted at his preſent anſwer, which hee deſired might be ſent in writing, refuſing to carry in words his reply to his Soueraigne. This Heralds wiſe & weightie requeſt was forthwith granted, and Letters framed to King Iames demands, anſwering thoſe imputations with rough and round words, which notwithſtanding he neuer read or ſaw, being ſlaine in the battell of Flodden, before that Lions could come to deliuer the ſame.

(13) For Iames King of Scots preparing for war, had in the meane while entred the borders, and with his Ordnance battered and wonne the Caſtle of Norham; making ſtill forward vpon the Engliſh. Againſt whom Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey made the Kings Lieutenant of the North at his going into France, aſſembled an Army of twentie ſixe thouſand ſtrong, vnto whom came his Sonne the Lord Admirall of England, with a great ſupply of good Souldiers well-appointed for warre. The Earle from Newcaſtell came vnto the water of Till, and pitched his battell beſides a little Towne called Brankeſton, vnder Flodden hill, a mountaine lying in the North of Northumberland, betwixt the Riuers Till and Tweed, where, vpon a riſing bank, the Scottiſh hoaſt had taken the aduantage of the ground: vnto King Iames, Thomas Earle of Surrey ſent Rouge-Croſſe a Purſeuant at Armes, with proffer of battell to be done vpon Friday the ninth of September, if ſo it pleaſed his Highneſſe; who withall carried this meſſage from the Lord Admirall, that he was come in perſon to iuſtifie his act againſt Andrew Barton, and would abide the laſt drop of his blood in the Vantguard of the field.

(14) King Iames moſt readily accepted the offer, and by his Herald Hay ſent the Earle word, that if hee were as then in Edenbrough, yet would he moſt gladly come to fulfill his deſire; and withall ſent his Letters for the juſt occaſions giuen him to inuade England as he did. The day approached, and the Scots keeping the higher ground, the Earle marched vpward along the Riuer, and by two Bridges paſſed ouer with his hoaſt, making ſtill forward, as though he meant either to haue taken into Scotland, or elſe to circumuent King Iames his returne: which hee perceiuing, haſted downe the hill, putting from him his horſe, raiſed his royall Standard, and as a moſt valiant Chiefetaine encouraged his Souldiers to the fight.

The fight begun.

(15) The Scottish Ordnance discharged from aboue, ouer-shot the English with very small dammage, and the ground of no difficult ascent, gaue them the easier accesse, so that Sir Edmund Howard, who led a wing to the Vantguard (whereof his Brother the Admirall was Captaine) got almost to the height; against whom the Earles of Lenox and Argile, with their Battels of Speares on foot so violently encountred, that they beat downe and brake the wing of the English, wherein many were slaine, and the Horsemen disbanded, and put to flight; but presently recalled, joyned themselues againe to the great Battell, which by this time had attained to the toppe of the hill. King Iames, that saw this first brunt performed, made full account that the day was his owne, supposing verily the English had fled, and therefore most valiantly hee aduanced forward, not staying for the Reregard to second his Battell, and encountring the Earles Battalion, a bloody fight was performed, with the losse and life of many a man: but strength neere spent, and the Scottish somwhat dis-joyned, through force of a great showre of Arrowes falling among them; Sir Edward Stanley hauing three bands reserued for the like purpose, with a fresh on-set inuaded the open sides of the enemy, whose force was so violent, that the Scots no longer were able to stand, but tooke downe the hill vnto flight: which the Earles of Lenox and Argile perceiuing, did their best to stay them, and fighting most valiantly, themselues were slaine in the same place.

(16) King Iames then perceiuing the wings of his Battell distressed and gone, and that the enemy began to enclose him about; with a stout resolution incouraged his men, willing them to regard the person of their King, their own honour, their valiant Ancestors, and now their present employments; that their blood might bee bought deare to the English, and the Scottish valours recorded, for euer in the volumes of Fame for this their one daies worke; and thereupon rushing among the thickest, began a most eager and bloody battell, and piercing thorow with a strong hand went so far, that hee had almost ouerthrowne the Earles Standard; thus busied in doubtfull chance, the Lord Howard and Sr. Edward Stanley hauing discomfited the enemy in either wing, returned in the face of the maine Battell, and the Lord Dacres with his Horse-men came vpon their backes, so that the Scottish were forced to fight in a round compasse: but being ouer-laid, the Kings Standard was strucken downe, and himselfe most valiantly fighting slaine in the middest of his Enemies: with whom dyed three Bishops, whereof one was Alexander Archbishop of St. Andrewes the Kings base sonne, two Abbots, twelue Earles, and seuenteene Lords, Knights and Gentlemen a great number, in all about eight thousand, and almost as many taken prisoners, saith Paulus Iouius.

(17) The next day, when the Scouts had found the field cleared of enemies, and the English busied to bury their dead, the body of King Iames was found slaine among the rest, hauing receiued many bloody wounds, and most of them deadly: for his sides were stucke thicke with sharpe arrowes, his necke cut into the middest, and his left hand in two places almost cut quite off. These wounds notwithstanding, he was descryed, and knowne by the Lord Dacres, and others to bee the King: and thereupon his body bowelled, embalmed, and wrapped in Lead, was solemnly brought vnto the Monastery of Shine in Surrey, where no doubt it was honourably enterred: but at the dissolution of that House, in the daies of King of Edward the sixth, it was (as almost all other Monuments were) disturbed of rest, and throwne into a waste roome among old Timber, Stone, and Lead, which Iohn Stow, the Relater saith, himselfe so saw: and further declareth (let him be the Author) that the seruants of Launcelot Young Glasier to the late Queene, being at Shine in new glasing the windowes, either vpon a foolish pleasure, or desire of the Lead, cut the head from the rest: but smelling the sweet perfumes of the balmes, gaue it to their Master, who opening the Lead, found therein the Head of a man retaining fauour, though the moysture were cleane dried vp, whose haire both of Head and Beard was red, which after hee had well viewed, and a while kept, he caused to be buried in St. Michaels at Wood-street London, the Church of the Parish wherein himselfe dwelled.

(19) But as theſe his proceedings went proſperouſly forward, & his fame daily ſpred in further parts, ſo the Flemmings (who hitherto had held ſide with his ſailes) began to fall off ſuddenly, vpon the occaſion as followeth. It had beene concluded betwixt King Henry the ſeuenth, and Philip King of Spaine, that Charles his eldeſt ſonne ſhould marry Mary the younger daughter of the Engliſh King, with a Princely Dowry agreed vpon, but ſhe being young, and not ten yeers of age, and the Caſtilian vnable to giue aſſurance of her penſion aſſigned, that match went not forward during the life of her Father, howbeit King Henry her Brother greatly regarding her honor, prouided for the marriage, and ſignified ſo much to the Councell of Flanders: who dallied him off with many excuſes, and laſtly ſent him word they could not receiue her that yeere.

(20) This therefore gaue Lewis King of France occaſion to hammer at a peace, and making Pope Leo His, they both together put it in practice; the readier was Henry to liſten thereunto, both for the loue he bore to his ſiſter, and for the great regard he held of the Apoſtolike See, whence Iulius the ſecond, and this Popes Predeceſſor had lately ſent him a Cap of Maintenance and Sword, and by decree of Councell giuen him the Title Chriſtianiſſimo; which were receiued with great thankes, and ſolemnities. The French Kings deſire was to marry the ſaid Lady Mary, whoſe dowry hee aſſigned to bee thirty two thouſand Crownes by yeere, during her naturall life, couenanting further to pay vnto King Henry her Brother the ſumme of one hundred thouſand Crownes annually for fiue yeeres continuance.

(21) Peace thus concluded, the Lady Mary with an honourable Company was ſhipped at Douer, the Duke of Norfolke, the Marqueſſe Dorſet, and the Earle of Salisbury, beeing her chiefe Conductors: whoſe fleet had not paſſed two leagues at Seas, but that a ſudden tempeſt aroſe, and ſo violently raiſed the waues, as their Ships were ſeuered each from others, ſome into Flanders, ſome into Callis, and hers with great difficultie ſtrucke in at Bulloigne, where by Boates her traine was landed, and her ſelfe born to the ſhore in the armes of a Knight. (22) For, thus left a ſtranger in the French Court, and deſirous to turne againe into England; King Henry her brother, ſent Charles Brandon the new made Duke of Suffolke, to conduct the young Queene out of France. This Duke a gallant, and of a goodly preſence, ſo courted his charge, and carried himſelfe in the eye of her melting affections, as his loue entred deepely into her tender heart: which thing indeed King Henry perceiued before, for which cauſe, as was thought, he raiſed him to the grace of a Duke; howſoeuer the Gemme thus got, and too precious to be loſt, he made her his owne, by celebration of marriage before he paſt Callis, and thence ſent to intreate his Soueraignes conſent, who ſeeing it was bootleſſe to vndoe what was done, with a light touch of reproofe allowed their nuptials. But her dowry kept backe by the French, and other grieuances complained of, cauſed no little troubles betweene the two Realmes, as ſhall be related in place conuenient. In the meane while, let it not ſeeme ouer-tedious, if we (ſomewhat extrauagant and briefly) runne ouer the riſing and height of Thomas Wolſey, that great States-man and Pontificall Prieſt, ſeeing that many dependances of Story had their euents in the Acts of this man, who with the King together went as King, if not before him in managing the State.

Eraſ. Rot.

Thomas Wolſey his riſing.

(23) His birth was at Ipſwich in the County of Suffolke, his Parents poore, but of an honeſt report, and himſelfe a good Philoſopher, very eloquent and full of wit. His education in youth was at Oxford in Maudlin Colledge, and his firſt preferment from the Lord Marqueſſe Dorſet, who beſtowed vpon him a Benefice in his gift, in regard that hee was Tutor vnto his Sonnes; which Sir Amias Paulet ſo croſt him in, that hee tyed Wolſey by the feete in the Stockes, though afterward hee put this his Act among other his deeds, whereof he had iuſt cauſe to repent: for the Schoolemaſter no ſooner was mounted into the Chancellorſhip of England, but that hee laid his command vpon Paulet, and retained him as priſoner in the Middle-Temple the ſpace of 6. yeeres. But in the meane time Marqueſſe Dorſet dying, left Wolſeys pillar of hope altogether vnpoliſhed, and the baſe thereof it ſelfe vnſetled vpon any firme ground: ſo that Wolſey now ſought his fortune in France; who comming to Callis, became ſeruant to Sir Iohn Naphant the Treaſurer of that Towne, where he carried himſelfe with ſo great diſcretion, as ſhortly his Maſter preferred him to King Henry the ſeuenth.

Wolſey interteined in the Court.

(24) This Scholler hauing thus caſt Anchor at Court, the hauen of hope, was more then double diligent in the Kings eye, and very ſeruiceable alſo both to Doctor Fox Biſhop of Winchester, Secretary, and Lord Priuie Seale, as alſo to Sir Thomas Louell Maſter of the Wards and Conſtable of the Tower: but moſt of all vnto Fortune, that now fitted occaſion to make her ſelfe famous in this poore Butchers ſonne. For King Henry the ſeuenth hauing vrgent buſines with Maximilian the Emperour, ſent this his Chaplaine vnto him in poaſt; who poſted againe, before he was thought to be gone, and withall concluded ſome points forgot in his directions, to the high content of his Soueraigne Lord the King: for the which he beſtowed vpon him the Deanry of Lincolne, the worthieſt promotion vnder the degree of a Biſhop: then was he made the Kings Almoner, and preſently following one of the Priuy Councell; wherin his aduice was ſo wiſe, and his perſwaſions ſo weighty, that he was continually imployed to bee their expoſitor to the King, alwaies carrying a moſt ſpeciall regard, to preferre his Maieſties will howſoeuer it went; ſo that his mouth was the onely Organ that euer ſounded his pleaſure, and freedome from troubles of all State-affaires.

(25) But warres hauing beene commenced betwixt England and France, and Tournay loſt from the obedience of Lewis, King Henry gaue his Almoner the Biſhopricke thereof, and changed his Deanry of Lincolne into the Biſhopricke of the ſame Dioceſſe, and not long after ſet alſo the Miter of Yorke vpon Wolſeyes Wiſe-head: whereby hee became (as it were) three Biſhops at once; and now being Primas Angliæ, carried himſelfe accordingly, by erecting his Croſſe in the Kings Court, albeit it were within the Iuriſdiction of Canterbury, which ſeemed vnſufferable; for the dignity of the Church held then much by Precedency of place, and the giuing way to inferiours, was accounted the infringing of all religious liberties; Wherefore William Archbiſhop of Canterbury found himſelfe ſore agrieued to haue the Croſſe of Yorke (which owed him obedience) aduanced with his, and that in his preſence, for which hee greatly checked the preſumption of this proud Prelate.

in no better a caſe, then in a meane budget, which ſeemed ſomewhat diſgracefull in the new Cardinals eye; wherefore hee commanded a ſtay to be made of the bringers approach; and for the greater honour to this honourable Preſent, arrayed him in moſt coſtly ſilkes, beſeeming ſo great an Ambaſſador, who aduancing forward, he cauſed to be encountred by a number of gallant Gentlemen, and a great aſſembly of Prelates, vpon Blacke-heath, by whom he was conducted with much honour thorow the City of London, and his Preſent deliuered at Weſtminſter, attended by many mytred Biſhops and Abbots, with a rich ſhew of Copes, as if it had beene a Kings Coronation.

The great ſolemnitie in receiuing of the Cardinals Hat.

(27) Thus got before Canterbury by his power Legatiue, to weare now his Hat without controule of an equall, hee obtained the Purſe with the broad Seale of England, which Archbiſhop Warham had injoyed long before the death of King Henry the ſeuenth, and was made Lord Chancellour in his roome; ſo that beſides the Purſe and Mace of that honourable Office, he had two Croſſes and two Pillers borne euer before him by the talleſt Prieſts that were to bee found in the Realme. To the better maintenance of his chargeable eſtate, the King beſtowed on him the Biſhopricke of Wincheſter, and in Commendam the Abbey of Saint Albanes, and with them he held in Farme the Biſhoprickes of Bathe, Worceſter, and Hereford, injoyed by ſtrangers Incumbents, not reſiding in the Realme, ſo that now ſeeming a monſter with ſeuen heads, and each of them crowned with the Miter of a Biſhop; let vs thus leaue him dandled in Dame Fortunes lap, till ſurfeited with dalliance ſhee caſt him from thence.

(28) But the ſtate of Londons Tradeſmen proſpered vnder his greatneſſe nothing ſo well, for ſuch was the concourſe of ſtrangers, and ſo much were they borne with, by the ſuperiours, that they abuſed the Engliſh openly in the Markets, kept from a Citizen his owne Wife, with his plate, yea, and paſt with a ſmall penance for killing an Engliſhman. Theſe, firſt were complained of in a Sermon at Saint Maries Spittle, and afterwards aſſaulted, and much hurt done to their ſubſtance and houſes, for which riotous offence Iohn Lincolne the onely Inſtigator was hanged; and foure hundred men, boyes, and eleuen women led in ropes along the Citie in their ſhirts, and halters about their neckes, to the Kings Hall at Weſtminſter, where his Majeſtie ſitting vnder a cloth of Eſtate, pardoned the offences, to the great rejoycing of the Londoners.

(30) But peace much affected among Chriſtian Princes, and daily increaſed of moſt Potent Eſtates, was very much feared would worke alteration in the authoritie, abuſe, and great riches of the Clergy, if Kings might haue leiſure to looke into their owne charges at home. To buſie their heads therefore from all ſuſpition or jealouſies, Pope Leo the tenth deuiſed the meanes, by a preparation intended for the Holy-Lands wars; a ſubject in ſhew very religious, howſoeuer the former ſucceſſes had prooued it not pleaſing to God, when to recouer the Citie once holy, and to build vp that which Chriſt by Propheſie had caſt downe, as much Chriſtian blood was ſpilt to raze thoſe ruinous walles, as there was morter laid to faſten the ſtones of their firſt building.

(31) To this end therefore three Legates were ſent from the holy See of Rome, one into France, another into Germany, and Cardinall Campius into England, with whom was joyned Wolſey in Commiſſion, who hearing of the ragged retinue of his fellow Cardinall, ſent ſtore of Red cloth vnto Callis, to make them meet followers of ſo great a Lord; and Campius landed at Douer, Wolſey cauſed

(32) Eight Mules he had laden with necessaries belonging, but those made no shew in proud Wolseys eyes, therefore twelue more he sent him to furnish his Pageants thorow the streets of London; these either wanton, or ashamed to be wondred at, played the skittish Iades indeed: For in Cheape-side, as this Triumph forth-passed, these Beasts by breaking their Collers, and escaping their Leaders, cast their Carriages and Coffers vpon the cold ground; whose lids flying open, laid most of their riches to the sight of the people. For, from some of them fell old Breeches, Bootes, and broken shooes; from others, torne stockings, tottered rags, old Iron and Horse-shooes; and for fainting by the way, therein was bestowed, and now cast abroad, broken meate, mary-bones, rosted egges, and crusts of bread, ywisse worth the keeping: this Ship-wracke made vpon the Shelues of Cheape-side, no need it was to bid the Muliters to bestirre them, who like good thriftie Mariners saued from spoyle as much as they could, and trussing vp their trinkets, laded againe these wantons, with the wealth of the Cardinall, who (good man) was jogging on afore with his Crosses, Pillars, Gilt-axe and Mace, vnto Pauls Church, where hee was met with many Mitred Bishops, and attended vpon to Bathe place, where we will leaue him, and returne to the place where we left.

(33) The vnity agreed vpon betwixt England and France, a meeting was motioned for the two Kings, and to that end great preparation made aswell of the one, as of the other. But in the heat of this businesse, King Henry had word that Charles, his Queenes Nephew, and new-made Emperour, would visit him in England, which accordingly he did, accompanied with the Queene of Arragon, and a most Royall Traine, and was as royally entertained by King Henry: the cause of his comming was to hinder the peace concluded with France, for although this Emperour was young, and but newly established; yet was hee wise, and well fore-saw the hurt that this amitie with France would bring him, and therefore came in person of purpose to disswade the Kings minde, and to stay his entrance with the French if he could, but finding Henry so forward in those proceeds, hee baited his hookes with golden gifts to the Cardinall, that might doe all with the King, and wanne him wholly to his deuotion.

(34) King Henry passing the Seas vnto Callis, met with King Francis at a place newly built for that purpose, betwixt the Townes of Guisnes, and Arde: where to describe the Iusts, Banquets, and Maskes, were to fill vp (with Hall, Grafton, and Holinshead) whole sides of excessiue great cost. At Callis also the same time the Emperour, with his Aunt the Lady Margaret, Dutchesse of Sauoy landed, whither King Henry and his Queene repaired, to the no little grudge of the French King, though he kept it to himselfe, and consented vnto the ancient league tripartite betwixt these three Monarchs, which done, the Kings returned into their owne Realmes.

(36) Then was it thought best by the Cardinals aduice to repay like with like, & therefore counselled his King to reare Charles Duke of Burbon against France, and to perswade him to inuade the very heart thereof, incouraging him with sufficient pay, and making him his Champion-generall of the Field; whilest the Emperor likewise held him play against Millan

(37) That whereas in a treaty of peace it was concluded betwixt the Emperour, King Henry, and Francis the French King, that if any Controuerſies ſhould ariſe betwixt any two, the Prince not inuading ſhould giue ayde and aſſiſtance againſt the inuader: but now the Emperour being inuaded by the French Kings Captaines in the Realme of Nauarre, and in his owne Countrey by Robert de la March, and others by his procurement, and our King (ſaid they) being often called vpon by the Emperour, hath often entreated the French King to ſurceaſe, but hath nothing obtained, beſides faire words and detraction of promiſes. Complaining likewiſe, that in the intercourſe of theſe buſineſſes, the French King, contrary to his Oath, had ſent the Duke of Albany into Scotland (in contempt of King Henry) and to the great danger of the young Kings death or depoſition, hee being the next in blood to ſucceed, and to the diſhonour of the Queene-Mother, had cauſed a ſeparation betwixt her and her lawfull Husband the Earle of Angus. That the French King had detained the payment compounded for the deliuery of Tournay; and kept backe the dowry of his Siſter Queene Dowager of France; that he had entertained the rebellious Subjects of King Henry, and ſpoyled his Merchants both by Land and Sea. Neither was vn-remembred the danger that the Venetians ſtood in, if the Realmes of Naples, and Sicilie, the Seigniories of Ieanes and Millane were loſt from the Empire. Theſe therefore ſeemed faire projects vnto King Henry for him to warre againſt France, and to that end a generall Muſter by Commiſſion was taken of all able men from ſixteene yeers & vpward, of euery Hamlet, Village, Burrough, Citie, Hundred, and Shire, throughout England, which ſeemed to many another Domeſday-Booke: and yet was there neither peace nor warre againſt France.

(39) Why the Titles Defender of the Church and Faith, were attributed vnto theſe two Princes, is no maruell; for Charles choſen Emperour, was ſcarſly confirmed, but to purchaſe the Popes fauour, he directed forth a ſolemne Writ of Out-lawry againſt Martin Luther, who then had giuen a great blow to the Papall Crowne. And King Henry likewiſe was renowned in Rome, for writing a Booke againſt the ſaid Luther: vnderpropping the tottering or downe-caſt countenance of the Popes pardons; which Luther ſhrewdly had ſhaken; the Pope therefore, to ſhew himſelfe a kinde father vnto thoſe his ſonnes, gaue them theſe Titles; which in truth were none other, then the ſame which they ſware vnto, when the Crownes of their Empires were firſt ſet vpon their heads. But with what acceptance his Holineſſe receiued King Henries booke, his owne Oration ſolemnely made at the deliuery thereof vnto M. Iohn Clarke the preſenter, and Kings Ambaſſador, in his Conſiſtory, and in the preſence of his Cardinals, ſufficiently doth ſhew, the tranſlation whereof we haue inſerted as we find it in the Originall it ſelfe.

(41) Leo Episcopus, seruus seruorum Dei, &c. Leo Bishop, seruant of the ser- uants of God; To our most dearely belo- ued Sonne in Christ, Henry King of Eng- land, Defender of the Faith, health and Apostolicall Benediction. Wee by Diuine permission, the chiefe Ouer-seer for the Gouernment of the Vniuersall Church, though vnsufficient for so great a worke, doe powre forth the cogitations of our heart, that the Catholike faith, without which no man can attaine to saluation, may receiue continuall increase, and that those good Lawes and Constitutions decreed by the wis- dome and learning of such as are in Au- thoritie, especially the faithfull in Christ, for restraining the attempts of all that la- bour to oppresse the same, or by wicked lyes and fictions seeke to peruert and obscure it, may prosper with perpetuall increase, doe bestow our paines and vtmost endeauour in our office and Ministery. And like as the Romane Bishops our predecessors, were woont to shew especiall fauour to Catholike Princes (according as the qualitie of mat- ters and times required) especially to them that in troublesome times, when the mad- nesse and perfidious dealing of Schisma- tikes and Heretikes most of all abound, did abide constant and vnmooueable, not onely in soundnesse of faith and pure deuotion to the holy Romane Church, but also as the most Legitimate Sonnes and valiant Champions of the same, opposed them- selues both with minde and body against the furious madnesse of Schismatikes and He- retikes: so likewise also doe we desire to ex- toll your Majestie with worthy and immor- tall praises, for your high and immortall deserts and labours towards vs, and this holy See, wherein by Gods permission wee sit, to grant vnto it those things for which it ought to watch, and driue away the Woolues from the Lords flocke, and to cut off with the Materiall sword rotten members, which infect the mysticall bo- dy of Christ, and to confirme the hearts of the faithfull in soundnesse of beliefe. Now, where, of late our beloued sonne Iohn Clarke your Majesties Orator with vs, being in our Consistorie before our venera- ble Brethren of the holy Romane Church, the Cardinals and many other Prelates of the same, exhibited a Booke vnto vs to bee examined and allowed of vs, which Booke your Maiesties selfe (who doth all things with diligence, and nothing amisse) enflamed with charitie and zeale to the Catholike faith, and with ardent deuoti- on toward vs, and this holy See, hath com- posed, as a most worthy and soueraigne Antidote against the errors of diuers He- retikes, often condemned by this holy See, and of late stirred vp and brought in by Martin Luther: And your said Orator hath also largely declared vnto vs, that your Majestie is ready, and purposeth, like as you haue confuted the notorious errors of the said Martin, by true reason and inuin- cible authorities of Sacred Scripture, and ancient Fathers, so you will punish to the vt- termost of your power, all those of your whole Kingdome, that shall presume to fol- low, or defend them: and wee haue dili- gently and exactly perused and viewed the admirable doctrine of your said Booke, wa- tered with the deaw of heauenly Grace, and doe heartily thanke Almightie God, from whom euery good and perfect gift doth come, who hath vouchsafed to inspire your Noble minde, inclined to euery good thing, and to endue you with so great grace from heauen, as to write those things, whereby you are able to defend his holy faith, against such a new Innouator of damned errors; and also incite by your example all other Christian Kings and Princes, to be willing to fauour and further, with all their best aydes, the Orthodoxall Faith, and Euangelicall Truth, whensoeuer it be brought into danger or doubt. And wee thinke it also meete, that they who haue vndertaken such godly labours for the Defence of the Faith of Christ, should haue all praise and honour of vs; and we are desirous, that not only the things themselues which your Majestie hath written, being both of most sound doctrine, and no lesse eloquence, should bee extolled and magnified with condigne commendations, and allowed and confirmed by our authoritie; but also that your Majestie should bee graced with such an honour, and such a Title, as that both for our time, and euer hereafter, all men might perceiue how gratefull and acceptable this gift of your Majesties hath beene vnto vs, especially offered vnto vs now at this time. Wee, who be the true successors of Peter, whom Christ at his ascension into heauen left his Vicar on earth, and to whom hee committed the care of his flocke: Wee, I say, who sit in this holy Seate, from which all dignities and Titles doe flow, vpon mature deliberation had with our said Brethren about these things, haue by the generall agreement and consent of them decreed, to bestow vpon your Majesty this Title, namely, THE DEFENDER OF THE FAITH. And accordingly by these presents doe instile you with such a Title, commanding all faithfull Christians that they name your Majestie with this Title, and when they write to you, that after the word KING, they adjoyne DEFENDER OF THE FAITH. And truly, wee diligently considering and weighing your singular merits, were not able to bethinke vs of a name more worthy and conuenient for your Majestie, then the excellencie and dignitie of this Title, which so often as you shall heare and reade, so often you may call to minde this your singular vertue and great desert; nor may you by this Title puffe vp your selfe in pride, but according to your wonted prudence become more humble, and be more valiant and constant in the Faith of Christ, and in deuotion to this holy See, by which you haue beene exalted, rejoycing in the Lord the Giuer of all good things, leauing this as a perpetuall and immortall monument of your glory to your children, shewing them the way vnto the like, that if they shall desire to bee graced also with such a Title, they must labour to doe such workes, and to follow the excellent steps of your Majestie, whom, accordingly as you haue well deserued of vs, and this said See, together with your Wife, and all your Children that shall bee borne of you, or of them, wee blesse with our Benediction, with a large and liberall hand, in the name of H I M, from whom the power of granting this blessing is giuen vnto vs, praying and beseeching that Almightie One, who saith, By mee Kings raigne, and Princes rule, and in whose hands are the hearts of Kings, *That hee will confirme your Majestie in your holy purpose, and increase your deuotion, and by your worthy endeuours for the sacred faith, so to illustrate your renowne, and make you glorious through all the world, that this our Testimonie which wee haue giuen of you, adorning you with so excellent a Title, may neuer be judged by any to bee false or vaine. Lastly, wee desire God, that after this life ended, hee would make you partakers of his eternall glory. The hard vſage of the Scots.

Warke Caſtell beſieged by the Scots.

(50) The Regent not able to digeſt the Earles pill, commanded his Army to march forward into the Engliſh Marches, wherewith the common Souldiers much reioyced, but the wiſer of the Nobility vrged this in their Councell, that hauing diſplayed in warlike maner, their Banners vpon the Verge of the Borders, and defended their Countrey from the ſpoile, they ſaw no great reaſon further to proceed, no neceſſity or cauſe mouing, beſides the quarrell of the French: and thereupon repayring to the Regent, they demanded why they ſhould proceed further, alleadging that at his commandement (yea and that willingly) they had ſo farre paſſed, for the defence of their Countrey, which was ſufficient without further inuaſion of the others, the time ſo vnconuenient in the nonage of their young King, and the action ſo dangerous, wherein all the Peeres of Scotland were aſſembled, to attend and ſuffer the doubtfull iſſue of warre, which euer is vncertaine, and more loſſe in one battell many times ſuffered, then gaine can be gotten in many: whereof too too lamentable experience (ſaid they) we haue had by King Iames, that by peace and life, brought Scotland to her beſt, but by his warre and death almoſt to the worſt, therefore would wee know (ſaid the Nobility) whether this your intent ſtands with the weale of the King and vs, or elſe is proſecuted in the cauſe of your ſelfe and the French.

The Scottiſh Nobility expoſtulateth with the Regent.

More loſt by war, then gotten by victory.

(51) The Duke making ſome pauſe, laſtly replyed, and ſaid; "This queſtion would haue beene demanded ere "now: for well you know, that from "Scotland I beare my name, honour and "lineage, haue paſſed the Seas from the "noble Realme of France for the loue "of my Countrey, to ſet you in amity "which were at diſſention, by whoſe "diuiſion your Realme lay proſtrate to "deſtruction and Conqueſt, for whoſe "aid, you ſee I haue procured the French "to ioyne with you againſt the Engliſh. The defence of a kingdome, is "the office of a King, the honour of the "Noble, the seruice of the Souldier, and "the duty of a naturall Subject. But be "it as you will, yet hauing so puissant "an Army, to auoide our own reproach, "and encouragement of the Enemy, "let vs campe here still on the Borders, "till we see what the English-men in- tend.

Margaret Queene of Scotland worketh a peace.

(52) But Margaret Queene of Scots solliciting her brother for a Peace, these stirres brake vp for a time, as those in France did shortly after, by the working wit of Cardinall Wolsey, who in the State affaires was euer one, which made him the more emulated, and the grieuances of the Commons euer cast vpon him; in so much that it was commõly spõken, hee was the causer of the heauy impo- sition granted to maintaine the Kings warres, which was so importable to the poorer sort of Subjects, as the payment thereof was vtterly denied to the ap- pointed Collectors, with weepings, cur- sings, and great acclamations; yea, and almost grew to an open Rebellion: for Kent denied it to the Lord Cobham: Essex refused to commune with the Cõ- missiouers: Huntingtonshire resisted and would not heare them: London would be taxt by none but by their Aldermen: and Suffolke rose vp in Armes, making Pouerty their Captaine. Of these stirres when King Henry heard, hee had great indignation, blaming the counsellours, and wrote his Letters vnto euery Coun- ty, that no such demands should be paid: and the Cardinall, to curry-fauour with the Commons, gaue it forth forsooth, that at his intercession the Offenders were pardoned, and the money remitted.

Ex Bibliotheca Dom. R. Cotton Baronet.

An. Dom. 1525. King Henry falleth from the Emperour.

(53) And now more to shew his owne power, then any great cause; hee began to alienate the heart of King Hen- ry against his Nephew the Emperour, and caused him to with-hold pay from the Duke of Burbon his late made Gene- rall: which was the cause of the French Kings Captiuitie. For Burbon incamped within the Towne of Pauia, and besieged by the French in most war-like manner, was for want of his said pay so despe- rate of life, that hee attempted a most dangerous escape. In the dead of the night hee set a part of his company to assaile the enemy on that side of the Towne which was least strong, himselfe issuing secretly out of a Posterne on the contrary side. The watch but slender, and the Souldiers asleepe, a great terror arose, in which the besiegers turned their Ordnance to the place of the cry, when as suddenly Burbon was at their backes, and winning their Ordnance, discharged them against their Owners, slew their Souldiers, cut downe their Tents, and by the Vice-roy of Naples was the French King taken prisoner in the field.

(54) This fortunate successe made these Almaines more bold, who pre- sently with the Imperiall Ensignes mar- ched towards Florence, and thence to Rome, vnto whose walles in one day they gaue three assaults, in the last whereof Charles Duke of Burbon their Generall was slaine; notwithstanding the Citie was taken and sacked; Pope Clement in the meane-while, to make all sure, as hee thought, thundred out his Curses, and with Bell, Booke, and Can- dle, committed those Lutherans to Hell; who neuertheless broke downe that windy Bulwarke, and with great slaugh- ter forced him with twenty three Car- dinals, into the Castle of Saint Angelo, where they kept them besieged from the sixt of May, vnto the tenth of De- cember: in which time, in mockage of the Pope, the Souldiers to make solace, did often apparell one in Pontificall at- tire, who sometime should blesse them, and sometime accurse them, and riding on Horse-backe with a Whoore set be- hind him, should so passe the streets, that the Pope and Cardinals might see him. These contumelies and Papall Captiui- ties were grieuously taken by many Christian Princes, insomuch that Cæsar in Spaine forbade all Enterludes to bee plaide, and Pageants prepared for joy of the birth of his Sonne, Prince Philip, to be pulled downe. In France by the Court of Parliament the Duke of Bur- bon was condemned of Treason, his name and memoriall accursed, his Armes puld downe, and his Lands and goods confiscated; neither would King Henry of England answer the Emperours Let- ters, wherein he excused himselfe from hauing any hand in the action.

dience, and killing the Kings ſubjects where they found them: againſt whom Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey, Lord Lieutenant of that kingdome, made forth his power, and followed them himſelfe with ſuch danger of life, that the viſor of his Helmet was ſhot off, as hee purſued the enemy thorow the deſart woods: but theſe Rebels cut off by his high valour, and warres proclaimed at one time againſt Scotland and France, the Lord Lieutenant was recalled into England; and Piers Butler Earle of Oſorie made Deputy of Ireland in his ſtead; betwixt whom, and Girald Fitz-Girald Earle of Kildare, whoſe ſiſter hee had married, aroſe no little ſtrife and debate, which grew to that height, as King Henry ſent Commiſſioners to trie and examine the differences, which was ſo cleared on Kildares behalfe, that Oſorie was diſcharged of his Office, and the Lord Fitz-Girald ſworne Deputy in his place; whereat Cardinall Wolſey (whoſe hand chiefly ſteered all States affaires, a deadly enemy to the Earle of Kildare) was highly offended, and to vndermine the foundations of this his new Gouernment, gaue eare vnto Oſorie, who accuſed the new Deputy of many miſ-demeanours, among which theſe were the principall; that he winked at Deſmonds eſcape, whom he ſhould haue attached by order from the King: that hee grew ouer-familiar with the natiue Iriſh; and that he put to death the Kings beſt Subjects: for theſe the Lord Deputy was commanded into England, in whoſe abſence Oſorie, his enemy, was againe choſen Lord Deputy by the Kings Councell, but himſelfe none of the wiſeſt for politike Gouernment, was altogether therein ruled by his Wife, and ſhe made it no courteſie to abuſe her Husbands honour againſt her naturall brother Kildare, who now in England muſt anſwer his demeanour before the Lords of the Councell; and to their Table was he brought, where the Cardinall, Lord Chancellor, made his faults nothing leſſe, and thus addreſſed himſelfe againſt the Earle of Kildare:

"(56) I wot well (my Lord) that I "am not the meeteſt at this boord to "charge you with theſe treaſons, becauſe "it hath pleaſed ſome of your Pew-fel-"lowes, to report, that I am a profeſſed "enemy to all Nobilitie, and namely, to "the Giraldines: but ſeeing euery ſhrewd "Boy can ſay as much when hee is con-"trouled, and theſe points ſo weightie, "that they ſhould not be diſſembled of "vs; and ſo apparant, that they cannot "be denied of you: I muſt haue leaue "(notwithſtanding your ſtale ſlander) "to bee the mouth of theſe honourable "Lords at this preſent, and to trumpe "your treaſons in your way, howſoeuer "you take me. Firſt you remember, how "the lewd Earle of Deſmond your kinſ-"man (who paſſeth not whom hee ſer-"ueth, might he change his Maſter) ſent "his Confederates with Letters of cre-"dence vnto Francis the French King: "and hauing but cold comfort there, "went to Charles the Emperour, proffe-"ring the helpe of Mounſter, and Co-"naught, towards the Conqueſt of Ire-"land, if either of them would helpe to "win it from our King. How many Let-"ters, what precepts, what meſſages, "what threats, haue beene ſent you to "apprehend him, and yet not done? "Why ſo? Forſooth I could not catch "him? Nay, nay Earle, forſooth you "would not watch him: If hee be juſt-"ly ſuſpected, why are you partiall in ſo "great a charge? If not, why are you "fearefull to haue him tryed? Yea, for "it will be ſworne and depoſed to your "face, that for feare of meeting him, you "haue winked wilfully, ſhunned his "ſight, altered your courſe, warned your "friends, ſtopped both eares and eyes, "againſt his detectors, and whenſoeuer "you tooke vpon you to hunt him out, "then was he ſure afore-hand to bee out "of your walke. Surely, this iugling and "falſe play, little became either an ho-"neſt man, called to ſuch honour, or a "Nobleman put in ſo great truſt: had "you loſt but a Cow or a Horſe of your "owne, two hundred of your Retainers "would haue come at your Whiſtle to "reſcue the prey from the vttermoſt "edge of Vlſter: all the Iriſh in Ireland "muſt haue giuen you the way. One while he is from home, and "another while he keepeth home, ſome-"times fled, ſometimes in the Borders, "where you dare not venture. Ywiſſe, "my Lord, there be ſhrewd bugges in "the borders, for the Earle of Kildare to "feare; the Earle, nay the King of Kil-"dare: for when you are diſpoſed, you "raigne more like, then rule in the Land: "where you are pleaſed, the Iriſh foe "ſtandeth

"(58) That granted: It is good rea- "ſon (quoth the Earle) that your Grace "beare the mouth of this boord: but my "Lord, thoſe mouthes that put theſe "things into your mouth, are very wide "mouthes: ſuch indeed as haue gaped "long for my wracke: and now at length "for want of better ſtuffe, are faine to "fill their mouthes with ſmoake: what "my Couſin Deſmond hath compaſſed, "as I know not, ſo I beſhrew his naked "heart for holding out ſo long. If he can "be taken by mine Agents, that preſent- "ly waite for him, then haue mine ad- "uerſaries bewrayed their malice, and "this heape of heinous words ſhall re- "ſemble a ſcare-Crow, or a man of "ſtraw, that ſeemeth at a bluſh to carry "ſome proportion, but when it is felt "and peized, diſcouereth a vanity ſeruing "onely to feare Crowes: and I verily "truſt, your Honours ſhal ſee the proofe "by the thing it ſelfe, within theſe few "daies. But goe to: ſuppoſe he neuer be "had? What is Kildare to blame for it "more then my good Brother of Oſorie, "who, notwithſtanding his high pro- "miſes, hauing alſo the Kings power, "is yet content to bring him in at lea- "ſure? Cannot the Earle of Deſmond "ſhift, but I muſt be of Counſell? Can- "not he hide him, except I winke? If he "be cloſe, am I his mate? If he be frien- "ded, am I a traitor? This is a doubty "kinde of accuſation which they vrge "againſt me, wherein they are ſtabled & "myred at my firſt deniall. You would "not ſee him (ſay they:) Who made "them ſo familiar with mine eye-ſight? "Or, when was the Earle within my "view? Or, who ſtood by, when I let "him ſlip? Or, where are the tokens "of my wilfull hud-winke? But you "ſent him word to beware of you: Who "was the meſſenger? Where are the "Letters? Conuince my negatiues, ſee "how looſe this idle geare hangeth toge- "ther. Deſmond is not taken: well, you "are in fault: why? Becauſe you are: who "prooueth it? No body: What Con- "jectures? So it ſeemeth: To whom? "To your enemies. Who told it them? "They wil ſweare it. What other groũd? "None: Will they ſweare it, my Lord? "Why then, of like they know it, either "they haue mine hand to ſhew, or can "bring forth the meſſenger, or were pre- "ſent at a Conference, or priuy to Deſ- "mond, or ſome body bewraied it to "them, or they themſelues were my "Carriers or Vicegerents therein: which "of theſe parts will they chooſe? for I "know them too well: To reckon my "ſelfe conuict by their bare words, or "headleſſe ſayings, or franticke oathes, "were but meere mockerie. My Letters "were ſoone read, were any ſuch writing "extant; my ſeruants and friends are rea- "dy to be ſifted: of my Couſin of Deſ- "mond they may lie loudly, ſince no "man heere can well contrary them. "Touching my ſelfe I neuer noted in "them much wit, or ſo faſt faith, that "I would haue gaged on their ſilence "the life of a good Hound, much leſſe "mine owne. I doubt not, may it "pleaſe your Honours to appoſe them, "how they came to the knowledge of "thoſe matters which they are ſo ready "to depoſe; but you ſhall finde their "tongues chained to another mans tren- "cher, & as it were Knights of the Poſt, "ſuborned to ſay, ſweare, and ſtare the "vttermoſt they can, as thoſe that paſſe "not what they ſay, nor with what "face they ſay it, ſo they ſay no truth: "but on the other ſide, it grieueth mee, "that your good Grace, whom I take to "be wiſe and ſharpe, and who of your "bleſſed diſpoſition wiſheth mee well, "ſhould bee ſo farre gone in crediting "theſe corrupt Informers, that abuſe the "ignorance of your State and Country "to my perill. Little know you (my "Lord)

"Lord) how neceſſary it is, not onely "for the Gouernour, but alſo for euery "Nobleman in Ireland, to hamper the "vnciuill neighbors at diſcretion, wher- "in if they waited for proceſſe of law, "and had not thoſe liues and lands you "ſpeak of within their reach, they might "hap to loſe their owne liues and lands "without law. You heare of a caſe, as it "were in a dreame, and feele not the "ſmart that vexeth vs. In England there "is not a meane Subject that dare extend "his hand to fillip a Peere of the realme: "In Ireland, except the Lord haue cun- "ning to his ſtrength, and ſtrength to "ſaue his Crowne, and ſufficient autho- "ritie to take theeues and varlets when "they ſtirre, he ſhall finde them ſwarme "ſo faſt, that it will be too late to call "for juſtice. If you will haue our ſeruice "take effect, you muſt not tye vs al- "waies to thoſe iudiciall proceedings, "wherewith your Realme (thanked be "God) is inured. Touching my king- "dome, I know not what your Lordſhip "ſhould meane thereby; If your Grace "imagine that a kingdome conſiſteth in "ſeruing God, in obeying the Prince, "in gouerning with loue the Common- "wealth, in ſupporting ſubjects, in ſup- "preſſing Rebels, in executing juſtice, in "brideling blind affections, I would be "willing to be inueſted with ſo vertu- "ous and royall a name: but if therefore "you terme mee a King, in that you are "perſwaded that I repine at the gouern- "ment of my Soueraigne, or winke at "malefactors, or oppreſſe ciuill liuers: I "vtterly diſclaime that odious tearme, "maruelling greatly that one of your "Graces profound wiſedome, would "ſeeme to appropriate ſo ſacred a name "to ſo wicked a thing: but howſoeuer "it be (my Lord) I would you and I had "changed Kingdomes, but for one mo- "neth, I would truſt to gather vp more "crummes in that ſpace, then twice the "reuenewes of my poore Earledome: "but you are well and warme, and ſo "hold you, and vpbraide not mee with "ſuch an odious tearme. I ſlumber in a "hard Cabine, when you ſleepe in a ſoft "bed of Downe: I ſerue vnder the "Kings Cope of heauen, when you are "ſerued vnder a Canopie: I drinke wa- "ter out of my skull, when you drinke "wine out of golden cups: my Courſer "is trained to the field, when your Gen- "net is taught to amble: when you are "graced and belorded, and crouched and "kneeled vnto, then finde I ſmall grace "with our Iriſh borderers, except I cut "them off by the knees.

In what caſe ſtand the Noblemen of Ireland with Rebels.

At theſe girds the Lord Chancellor much fretted, and finding Kildare to be no Babe, deferred the hearing of his cauſe, till more proofes were produced from Ireland; then in a great fume hee aroſe from the Councell boord, and committed the Earle vnto priſon, againſt the minds of moſt at the Table, who knew well, that this his accuſation was more of hatred borne by the Cardinall, then any occaſion giuen by the accuſed late Deputy. Whereupon Thomas Duke of Norfolke ſtept to the King, and craued that Kildare might be his Priſoner, offering to bee bound in goods and body for his forth-comming: whom he obtained, though with no great liking of the Lord Chancellor, who daily entertained new plaints againſt him, till at laſt hee preſſed him ſore with Letters ſent to Oneale and Oconor, to incourage their rebellions againſt Oſorie the Lord Deputie; which Letters were brought them by his owne daughter and their ſiſters, the Lady Elice Fitz-Girald wife to the Baron of Slane.

Kildare committed to priſon.

(59) This preſumption being vehement, the King ſuſpicious, the Cardinall eager, and his friends faint, Kildare was ſent to the Tower, where hee committed himſelfe to GOD, and expected daily his death, but with ſuch couragious reſolution, as hee being in play with the Lieutenant at ſlide-groat, when the Mandate was brought for his execution on the next Morning, and ſeeing the Lieutenant ſtrucke into a ſudden ſadneſſe; by Saint Bride, Lieutenant (quoth the Earle) there is ſome mad game in that ſcrowll; but fall how it will, this throw is for a huddle: and when the worſt was told him, Now I pray thee (quoth he) doe no more but learne aſſuredly from the Kings owne mouth, whether his Highneſſe be witting thereto or no. The Lieutenant louing his Priſoner well, repaired to the King, and ſhewed him the Cardinals Warrant, who then controuled the ſawcineſſe of the Prieſt (for thoſe were his tearmes) and gaue the Lieutenant his Signet for a counter-mand, whereat the Cardinall ſtormed: but Kildare deliuered from his eminent death, and not long after from his impriſonment alſo, was ſent into Ireland, where, at his entrance into Dublin, he was met with a

In the exemplification of which league, the Venetians, and other Princes were left to their choyſe, whereof himſelfe notwithſtanding would be ſtyled the Protector. And to his Leaguer Ambaſſadours ſent theſe inſtructions to moue the States to conſider the Emperours aſpired greatneſſe, who now commanded the Kingdomes of Naples, and Sicilie, the Dutchie of Millan, the Seigniorie of Iean, the Countie of Aſt, and other poſſeſſions in Italie, the whole Countrey of Germanie, being the greateſt part of Chriſtendome, already either totally in his poſſeſſion, or facily might bee at his command, hauing likewiſe the lower parts thereof, as the Countries of Artoys, Flanders, Zeland, Holland, Brabant, Henault, and others; from the which alſo a direct paſſage lay vnto the Dutchie of Burgonie, Auerne, and Burbon, beſides the Realmes of Caſtile, Aragon, Granate, Galice, Auſtria, Perpynyon, Ruſſinian, and other parts of Spaine; whereupon, hee with ſome other Princes complained, and ſought the French Kings deliuerance, which when it was gotten, King Francis acknowledged Henry next vnder God to bee the onely meanes: * but was ſo ſlacke in performance of Couenants, that when the Emperor ſent to haue them accompliſhed, he with vnprincely termes returned the anſwere, with challenge of combate, which when the Emperour had accepted, he ſhrunke backe, and made meanes of a league.

*Sleidan. com. 1.6

(62) But howſoeuer the vnconſtancy of our King Henry hath beene blanched forth, for not holding himſelfe in his leagues or couenants of amity with other Princes; yet the cauſe being ſo as ſome haue obſerued, there were occaſions giuen, aſwell as opportunity taken: for Charles the Emperour, contrary to couenant, receiued Grancetor a trayterous Rebell, condemned by Parliament, whom hee refuſed to deliuer, though the King made earneſt ſuite for the man. Moreouer, by his Ambaſſadours in a Treaty of perpetuall peace, holden at Windſor-Caſtell, the nineteenth of Iune and foureteenth of King Henries raigne, it was concluded that Charles the Emperour ſhould contract the young Princeſſe the Lady Mary, and take her to his wife, when ſhee came to able yeeres, which (as Holinſhead ſaith) himſelfe ſought, at his being in England, promiſing to remaine vnmarried, till that Princeſſe had paſt her Minority, and againe before the battell of Pauia, (ſhee now growne vnto ſixe yeeres of age) ſent his Ambaſſadors to haue her ſtiled Empreſſe, and to bee made Gouerneſſe of the Low-Countries; all this notwithſtanding, after that victory againſt the French King, he began to re-call, and to make ſmall account of that match, pretending the deſire of his ſubiects to haue an heire of his body, which for long time hee could not by Lady Mary; but rather as the Engliſh judged, the cauſe was the money receiued in loane from King Henry, whereby (as hee thought) the greateſt part of her portion was already paide; and the Emperours wants being great, Iſabel the ſiſter of Portugall was much affected, with whom plenty of gold was expected, and great liberality offered by the Emperials, in deſire to haue an Empreſſe of their owne Nation.

Lady Maries legitimacion called in question.

(63) Besides, against this marriage with Mary, his Councell of Spaine also excepted, alledging her to be begot of his brothers wife, whereby her legitimation might be called in question, as also the issue of her body, which they in their wisedome thought meete to preuent; these no doubt were the causes that the negotiation of these two Potentates grew daily more desperate. And for his falling off from the French King, these occasions may well be alleadged.

The occasions King Henry had against France.

(64) That whereas it had beene couenanted at the marriage of Lady Mary vnto King Lewis departed this life, one hundred thousand Crownes should bee paid to King Henrie, and thirtie two thousand Crownes yeerly for her Dowry, during terme of life; both which notwithstanding were retained and kept backe vnpaide. 2. That the said French King had listned vnto Cardinall Poole, who was sent to him from the Pope to stirre warres against England. 3. That contrary to his Couenant hee had entred alliance with the house of Medicis, and had married his daughter Magdalen vnto Iames the fift King of Scotland, then an hostile enemy vnto King Henry. 4. That hee had made suite to match his second Sonne Henrie Duke of Orleance, with Lady Mary, the onely then Heire apparant of England, which when it came to conclusion, was put in suspence by Anthonie Vescie one of his French Commissioners, who then made doubt whether the marriage of her mother beeing wife to the Kings owne brother, could be dispensed with, or the children begot in this second bed, legitimate, or by law allowed to succeed in the Throne.

Obiction of the French for Lady Maries legitimation.

(65) These considerations no doubt drew the King to be vnconstant to them that were vnconstant in themselues, and the question of Lady Maries legitimation serued such doubts in his melting conscience, as neuer after could be made solid: whereof Doctor Longland, his Confessor, is said to be the first man which told the King that his marriage was vnlawfull, vnto whose opinion other great Clerkes did likewise consent; whereupon a rumour ran, that the King would be diuorced from the Queene, and the occasion thereof altogether cast vpon the Cardinall of Yorke, in displeasure taken against the Emperour, vnto whom he had beene suiter for the Archbishopricke of Toledo; whereof failing, he reuenged his spleene vpon his innocent Aunt Queene Katherine, in moouing the King to cast her off, and to become Suiter vnto the Dutchesse of Alenzon, Sister vnto the French King; these rumours King Henry himselfe forbad; but with no better successe then was the report of Queene Annes death, the wife of the Vsurper; both euents following, before the mouthes of those relaters could bee stopped; vnto which lamentable accident my penne must now enter.

(66) King Henry ouercome by the aduice of his Councell (lest so great a Dowry assigned should indammage England, if Lady Katherine of Spaine married else-where) presently vpon the death of his father, and not fully forty daies after hee had begun his Raigne (by the dispensation of Pope Iuly the second) tooke her to Wife, shee hauing beene wedded and bedded with Prince Arthur his elder Brother, as wee haue said.

King Henries marriage called in question.

(67) This match was made by King Henry the seuenth, and Ferdinando of Spaine their Parents, Prince Henry hauing then attained but to ten yeeres of age, and when hee came to foureteene, proscribed against it, as by a deed vnder his owne hand, I haue here inserted, the tenour thereof faithfully translated out of Latine, is thus as followeth:

In the name of God, Amen. In the presence of you reuerend Father & Lord in Christ, Lord Richard by the Grace of God, and See Apostolicke, Bishop of Winchester, I Henry Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester, doe say, affirme, and by these Writings declare; That although in the time of my Minoritie, and when I was vnder yeeres of marriage, I absolutely contracted Matrimony with the most vertuous Lady Katherine, Daughter of the King of Spaine, and although also the said Contract by reason of my being vnder age, doth now appeare of it selfe insufficient, weake, and of no force, vigour, or efficacie: yet forasmuch as that now I come to perfect yeeres, and that thereby the said Contract may peraduenture be thought and seeme, by silent consent, mutuall abode in one house, by giuing and receiuing gifts and tokens, or by any other way whatsoeuer, to be apparantly sufficient, and confirmed: Therefore I Henry Prince of Wales, doe heere protest, and make knowne to all men, that I intend not to approoue, ratifie, fie, or confirme in any ſort this pretended contract by any thing that I haue ſaid or ſhall ſay, haue done, or ſhall doe: but doe at this preſent renounce the ſame, freely, and of mine owne accord, vnconſtrained either by force, fraud, intreaty, or any way elſe: and I deny it, and wholly purpoſe and intend quite to relinquiſh this pretended contract of Matrimony by the beſt wayes and meanes that by law more fully, effectually, and ſufficiently I may or ſhall be able to doe, and expreſly doe diſauow the ſame, according as by theſe preſents I doe diſclaime it, and diſauow it; and I proteſt that I neither will nor intend to conſent vnto the ſaid Contract, or vnto the ſaid Lady Katherine as my eſpouſall and wife, by any word, deede, act, or geſture to be ſpoken, done, performed, or acted by mee, or in my name, by any whomſoeuer, whenſoeuer, or howſoeuer for the time to come. In witneſſe whereof I deſire, require, intreat, and adjure you all to giue teſtimony hereunto.

By mee HENRY Prince of WALES.

The aboue-written Proteſtation was read and made by the aforeſaid Noble Prince Lord Henry, in the preſence of the Reuerend Father and Lord in Chriſt, the Lord Richard, by Diuine permiſſion, Biſhop of Winchester, ſitting iudiciouſly in his Court; and I the Notary vnder-written, at that time preſent, the writer of his Acts in this behalfe appointed, and in the preſence of the vnder-named witneſſes, in the yeere of our Lord God 1505. the eight Indiction of the moſt holy See of our Father and Lord in Chriſt, by Diuine prouidence Pope Iulius the ſecond, in his ſecond yeere, and 27. of the moneth of Iune, in which day the ſaid worthy Prince was of perfect yeeres of marriage, as then he did there affirme, in a certaine outward Court within the Royall Palace of Richmond, ſituate in the Weſt-part of the ſaid Palace: Concerning all and ſinguler which things, the aforeſaid moſt Noble Prince inſtantly required and intreated mee the aforeſaid Notarie to frame an inſtrument, and likewiſe the witneſſes vnderwritten to giue teſtimony. In juſtification of all and ſinguler the premiſſes, the aforeſaid Noble Prince hath ſuperſcribed his name; and the witneſſes, as aforeſaid intreated and required, haue ſubſcribed their names, with their owne hands.

So it is as aboue ſaid, which I Iohn Read doe witneſſe by my hand and Seale.

Notwithſtanding this preſcription foure yeeres after, and the firſt of his Raigne, he tooke the ſaid Lady Katherine to Wife; and without all exception injoyed her nuptiall ſocietie the ſpace almoſt of twentie yeeres; in which time ſhee had borne him two ſonnes, both of them in their infancy taken away by death, and one Daughter, Lady Mary, growne now vnto tenne yeeres of age. But the ſcruple of Conſcience increaſing more tender in the Kings breſt, he firſt refuſed the Queenes bed; and then mooving the doubt vnto his owne Diuines, ſent for the opinions of the moſt Vniuerſities in Europe, as to Paris, Orleance, Bononie, Burges, Anjou, Padua, Tholouze, Vincentia, Vauia, Foro Iuly, and others, which howſoeuer they then ſtood for the Pope, and he allowing (by his Predeceſſors diſpenſation, whoſe doing could not erre) the Matrimony lawfull, yet theſe Academickes concluded againſt it, and ſignified the contrary vnder moſt of their common Seales, as the relation of the Kings Agent imployed vpon the ſame purpoſe for that of Padua doth import, which writing vnder his owne hand I haue ſeene, and here will inſert his words, as followeth:

The King refuſeth the Queenesbed.

Ex Manuſcript.

Pleaſeth it your Highneſſe to bee aduertiſed, that as this day I obtained the Common Seale of the Vniuerſitie of Padua in ſubſtantiall and good forme; for all the Doctors were aſſembled vpon Sunday, and the caſe was amongſt them ſolemnly and earneſtly diſputed all Munday, Tueſday, Wedneſday, and Thurſday, and this preſent Friday in the morning. And thereupon they concluded with your Highneſſe, and deſired a Notary to ſet his ſigne and hand vnto an inſtrument by Leonicus and Simonecus deuiſed, in Corroboration of your cauſe, and thereby to teſtifie that this inſtrument was their deed, deuice, act and concluſion. And more credence to be giuen to the ſaid inſtrument, they cauſed the Chancellor of the Poteſtate ſtate hereto to ſet his hand and Seale for the approbation of the Authoritie of the Notary: A Copy of all the which things I ſend vnto your Highneſſe by this Bearer, in moſt humble wiſe beſeeching the ſame to be aduertiſed, that the Generall of the Blacke-Fryers hath giuen commandement that no Blacke Frier diſpute the Popes Power: Notwithſtanding Prior Thomas Omnibonus procureth daily new ſuperſcriptions, and will doe till the briefe of contrary commandement ſhall come vnto his hands. My fidelitie bindeth me to aduertiſe your Highneſſe, that all Lutherans be vtterly againſt your Highneſſe in this cauſe, and haue letted as much with their wretched poore malice, without reaſon or authoritie, as they could and might, aſwell here as in Padua and Ferrara, where be no ſmall company of them: I doubt not but all Chriſtian Vniuerſities, if they be well handled, will earneſtly conclude with your Highneſſe. And to obtaine their aſſent as well thorow Italie, France, Almaine, Auſtrich, Hungary, and Scotland, I thinke it maruellous expedient for the preferment of this your moſt honourable and high cauſe.

And in another Letter, dated from Venice the 13. of Iuly, the ſaid Agent thus writeth: I haue procured vnto your Highneſſe, as appeareth by the Originals being in my hand alone, the Subſcriptions of an hundred Diuines, beſide the concluſion Collegij Theologorum Pacamnot, vnder their common Seale, whereof I haue ſent your Highneſſe a Copy, &c.

The decree of the Lawyers in the Vniuerſitie of Paris.

We the Deane and Colledge of the Vniuerſity of Paris, after many diſputations and reaſons made vpon both ſides, turning and ſearching of Bookes, both by the Law of God, the Popes Law, and the Ciuill Law; we ſay, that the Pope hath no Power to diſpence in this caſe of Matrimony. Yeouen vnder the Seale of their facultie, at Saint Iohn Lateranenſe in Paris, May 2. 1530.

The Iudgement of the Diuines in the Vniuerſitie of Paris.

The Deane and the faculty of holy Diuinitie in the Vniuerſitie of Paris, to all them to whom this preſent writing ſhall come, wiſheth ſafetie in Chriſt; For the Queſtion propoſed, we came together in the Church of Saint Martin, and there, for the ſame cauſe, had a ſolemne Maſſe of the Holy Ghoſt, and vpon our oathes determine, that the foreſaid Marriage with the Brothers Wife departing without children, is ſo forbid by the Lawes of God and Nature, that the Pope hath no power to diſpence with ſuch Marriages, whether they be contract or to be contracted; to which this our aſſertion we haue cauſed the Seale of our facultie, with our Notaries ſigne to be put to this preſent writing. Dated in our Generall Congregation. Iuly 2. Anno 1530.

After wee the Doctors and Rector had diſcuſſed and examined many places, as well of the Law of God, as of mans Law, vpon ſufficient deliberation taken, wee define and determine, that neither by the Law of God, nor of Nature, it is permitted for any Chriſtian man, no not with the authoritie of the See Apoſtolicke, or with any diſpenſation granted by the Pope, to marry the Wife that his Brother hath left. In witneſſe whereof wee haue commanded the Scribe of our Vniuerſitie to ſigne this preſent publike inſtrument with the great Seale of our ſaid Vniuerſitie. Enacted in the Church of Saint Peter in Anjou. May 7. Anno 1530.

The Determination of the Vniuerſitie of Burges.

We the Deane and facultie of Diuinity, in the Vniuerſity of Burges, after the example of Saint Paul the Doctor of the Gentiles, begin with prayer to the quieting of the conſcience, to whom this our writing ſhall come; The Queſtion mooued, is, Whether the Brother taking the Wife of his dead Brother, the marriage conſummated, and perfect, bee a thing lawfull or no? Wee by much labour and turning of Bookes, euery one of vs apart by himſelfe, free from corruption, the better to obey the truth, finde it forbidden by the Leuiticall Law, which is Gods, and that ſuch marriage is an abominable diſcouering of his Brothers ſhame, which cannot bee allowed by the authoritie of any man: which our determination wee haue cauſed to be ſigned with the Seale of our facultie, the tenth day of Iune, and yeere of our Lord, 1530.

The opinions of the Diuines in the Vniuerſitie of Bonony.

All wee Doctors of Diuinitie in this Vniuerſitie, vnto whom this Queſtion was propounded, Whether it was forbidden onely by the Ordinance of the Church, or elſe by the Law of God, that a man might not marry the left Wife of his brother departed without children, and hauing examined the matter euery one of vs alone, laſtly came all together, and as it were line by line, and rule by rule, brought forth the reaſons for the contrary part, with thoſe of the moſt Reuerend Father Cardinall Cajetaine, yea, and of the diſpenſation for raiſing vp ſeed to his Brother, ſpoken of in Deuteronomie; thus wee determine, giue judgement, and ſay, and confidently doe hold and witneſſe, that ſuch marriage is horrible, accurſed, and to bee cryed out vpon, and vtterly abominable, not onely for a Chriſtian man, but for an Infidell, vnfaithfull, or heathen: and that it is prohibited vnder grieuous paines and puniſhments by the Law of God, of Nature, and of man, and that the Pope, though hee may doe much, vnto whom Chriſt gaue the Keyes of the Kingdome of Heauen, hath no power to a diſpenſation to any man to contract ſuch marriage: In witneſſe whereof wee confirme this our judgement, both vnder the Seale of our Vniuerſitie, as alſo with the Seale of our Colledge of Doctors of Diuinitie, and haue ſubſcribed it in the Cathedrall Church of Bonony, this tenth of Iune, the yeere of our Lord 1530.

The determination of the Vniuerſitie of Padua.

Seeing that certaine great Orators and Ambaſſadors did humbly require of vs, that wee would vouchſafe to ſearch out with all diligence this Queſtion following, Whether to marry the Wife of our brother departed without children, is forbidden onely by the Law of the Church, or by the Law of God alſo: and if forbid by both the Lawes, Whether the Pope may diſpence with any man for ſuch Matrimony or no? which Queſtion wee haue diſcuſſed, and as farre as wee can, haue made it cleare, both priuate euery man by himſelfe, and after all together openly, we ſay, judge, decree, witneſſe, and for truth affirme, that ſuch marriage is no marriage: yea, and that it is abhorred and curſed of euery Chriſtian man, and to bee abominate as a grieuous ſinne, and that it is clearely forbidden, vnder cruell penaltie, by the Lawes of God, of nature, and of man, and that the Pope, vnto whom the Keyes of the Kingdome of Heauen are committed by Chriſt the Sonne of God, hath no power to diſpence, by the right of law, for any cauſe, ſuggeſtion, or excuſe, that any ſuch Matrimony ſhould be contracted. In witneſſe whereof we haue made this writing, and haue authorized it, with the accuſtomed Seale of our Vniuerſitie: Dated at Padua, in the Church of the Heremites of Saint Auguſtine, the firſt of Iuly, and yeere of our Lord 1530.

The determination of the Vniuerſitie of Tholouze.

It was treated in our Vniuerſitie of Tholouze: Whether it were lawfull for a brother to marry her which had beene Wife to his brother now departed, and without children: as alſo, Whether the Pope, which hath the cure of Chriſts flocke, allowing it by his diſpenſation it be lawfull: to reſolue which, the beſt Doctors of Diuinitie, and the Lawes, did ſweare that they would obey the ſacred Councels, and would follow the holy Decrees of the Fathers, and falling to concluſion ſtucke faſt vpon this point, That it is lawfull for no man, neither by the Law of God, or by the Law of nature, to take her to Wife that his brother hath left; neither can the Pope diſpence with this Law of God: as touching the Commandement in Deuteronomy, that the Brother ſhould marry his Wife to raiſe vp ſeede vnto him, that his name ſhould not periſh among the Tribes of Iſrael: we anſwer that that Law was but a ſhadow and figure of things to come, which vaniſhed away as ſoone as the ſubſtance of the Goſpell appeared. Thus haue we giuen our ſentence, which we haue ſigned with our Authenticall Seale of this Vniuerſitie. Yeouen at Tholouze, the Calends, or firſt day of October, the yeere of our Lord, 1530.

Theſe and many more were read by the Lord Chauncellour vnto the lower Houſe of Parliament, that they might report in their Countries, the Kings juſt cauſe of diuorce: And with what key K. Henry opened the golden ſhut of the Popes

Popes Conſiſtory for his free acceſſe, therein to enroll his owne Banes, to his beſt liking, I cannot ſay, but thus I finde it confirmed by a Bull of Pope Clement the ſeuenth, dated three yeeres before theſe publiſhed determinations in theſe words:

Bulla Clementis Sept. Conceſſa Henrico Octauo de ſecundis nuptijs contrahendis conſtante nullitate primarum.

The Originall remaineth in the Library of Sir Rob. Cot. Knight Bano.

Clement Biſhop, Seruant of the Seruants of GOD, to our dearely beloued Sonne in Chriſt, Henry King of England, Defender of the Faith, Health, and Apoſtolicall benediction.

You cauſed not long ſince to bee ſignified vnto vs, that you, and our beloued Daughter in Chriſt, Katherine, the late widow of your Brother Arthur, (not beeing ignorant how neerely you were otherwiſe joyned together in the firſt degree of affinitie) haue made a contract of Matrimony by words otherwiſe lawfull, hauing at that preſent obtained no diſpenſation, at leaſt-wiſe Canonicall, or of any force, for the ſame. That you haue confirmed it with carnall knowledge one of another, and haue thereby brought forth a Childe, incurring the cenſure of excommunication. Moreouer, that (in regard your Majeſtie may not remaine in ſuch kinde of Matrimony without great offence to God, and that you might not continue longer in this ſinne and cenſure of excommunication) your Majeſtie doth deſire Abſolution from ſuch cenſure of excommunication at the hands of ſome ſufficient Eccleſiaſticall Iudge. Furthermore, that your Majeſtie doth deſire to haue this Matrimony pronounced in-firme and of none effect: And that it might bee lawfull for you, (notwithſtanding any Canon to the contrary) to make contract with any other woman whatſoeuer. That vpon the pronouncing of the nullitie touching this marriage, you might obtaine a diſpenſation, lawfully to bee joyned in Matrimony, therein freely to remaine and beget a lawfull heire by any other woman whatſoeuer, yea though ſuch ſhee bee who hath otherwiſe made contract with any other man, ſo ſhee haue not confirmed it with carnall knowledge: though ſhee bee otherwiſe neerely allied vnto you, either by the ſecond or a more remote degree of conſanguinitie, or the firſt degree of affinitie, or joyned to you by any lawfull or vnlawfull lying together: prouided ſhee bee not the relict of your ſaid Brother, though ſhee be annexed to you in kindred ſpirituall, or legall, yea though it bee an hinderance to the right of publique honeſty. Wherefore in the behalfe of your part (who affirme that it is to bee ſeene in ancient Records of your Kingdome, many great grieuous warres to haue beene raiſed, Chriſtian Peace and Concord diſquieted through the meanes of wicked men ſtirred vp with their owne deteſted luſt, and deſire of dominion, but pretending that thoſe, which haue beene begotten in lawfull marriages of your Anceſtors and Progenitors Kings of England were illegitimate, by reaſon of ſome fayned impediment of conſanguinitie or affinitie, and conſequently were not capable of the Kingdomes ſucceſſion, and that there hath followed miſerable deſtructions of Princes, Nobles, and People,) an humble ſupplication was made vnto vs, that wee would haue a care of the tranquillitie and peace of your Kingdome and Subjects, and that wee would (out of our Apoſtolicall benignitie) daigne to reſiſt ſo great euils, and otherwiſe in the foreſaid danger adminiſter ſome ſeaſonable remedies. Wee therefore which are ready alwaies (vnder God) to entertaine, and fauourably to grant the honeſt petitions of all Kings, at leaſt minding the ſafetie of Soules, but more eſpecially your Majeſties, for its manifold immeaſurable benefits towards vs and this holy Seat, wherein by the Diuine prouidence of God wee now ſit, not ceaſing daily, as well with might and ſword, as with penne and learning to free it from the wicked attempts of peſtilent men, which aduenture partly by force and wicked boldneſſe, partly with peruerſe doctrine vtterly to ſubuert it. Wee, by the foreſaid cauſes, and ſome others beſt knowne to our ſelues, beeing mooued to ſuch like ſupplications, by vertue of our Apoſtolicall authoritie, out of our certaine knowledge of the matter had by vs, and fulneſſe of our Apoſtolicall power, doe by the tenour of theſe preſents, grant you a diſpenſation, that if it ſhall ſo fall out that the contract with the foreſaid Katherine ſhall bee contrarily pronounced void, and of none effect, and that you ſhall bee lawfully freed from all intereſt in her, that then you may lawfully make contract of Matrimony with any other woman, and ſhee with you, prouided ſhee be not to this end enforced by you, yea though ſuch ſhee bee, who hath otherwiſe contracted *tracted her ſelfe to another man, ſo ſhee hath not confirmed it with carnall knowledge: though that ſhee be otherwiſe neerely allied vnto you, either by the ſecond or a more remote degree of conſanguinity, bee it the firſt degree of affinitie, or joyned to you by any lawfull or vnlawfull lying together, prouided ſhee bee not the relict of your ſaid Brother as before, though ſhee bee annexed to you in kindred ſpirituall or legall, * yea and bee an hinderance euen to the right of publique honeſty. And that you may lawfully remaine in this contract, though it were made betwixt you and the ſaid woman, either publiquely or priuately, and perfected by carnall knowledge one of the other. Further, wee decree that the iſſue (perhaps already conceiued, or what hereafter may be conceiued) ſhall bee legitimate, notwithſtanding all prohibitions of Diuine Lawes and other Conſtitutions or Ordinations whatſoeuer publiſhed to the contrary, which wee (as farre as our Apoſtolicall authoritie may ſtretch it ſelfe) in this caſe ſpecially and expreſly extenuate, they elſe-where ſtanding in full force as before. Diſtinctly forbidding in the name of holy obedience charging expreſly vnder the pronouncing of Gods holy judgement, the puniſhment of a Reprobate, and the reſt whatſoeuer Eccleſiaſticall cenſures and puniſhments, which I here pronounce, and promulgate in theſe writings, that no man hereafter ſhall either openly or priuately, by Law or otherwiſe preſume, or any way attempt to alledge, propound, or obiect any impediment of a pre-contract which was not compleatly confirmed, or of conſanguinitie in the ſecond or farther degree, of affinitie in the firſt degree as before, of kindred ſpirituall or legall, of hinderance to their honeſt report as before, againſt your iſſue, which by Gods bleſſing you ſhall injoy by any Matrimony whatſoeuer to bee contracted through the vertue of theſe preſents; or to defame them in words or deeds: Be it not therefore lawfull for any man to infringe, or by any raſh attempt whatſoeuer withſtand the tenour of our diſpenſation, decree, derogation, inhibition and charge, which if any one attempt, know hee that hee incurres the wrath of Almightie God, and his bleſſed Apoſtles* Peter and Paul. Dated in our Citie Vrbin, Anno Incarnationis Dom. 1527. 16. Kal. Ian. Pontificatus noſtri 5°.

* Et publicæ honeſtatis juſtitiæ impedimentum ſubſiſtat.

Thus haue we ſeene the determinations of diuers Academies in Chriſtendome, and likewiſe of Pope Clement himſelfe, confirmed by his Bull: the firſt, condemning the retention of that vnlawfull bed: and the other, admitting any other into his boſome, his Brothers relict onely excepted. So that the wrongs done by King Henrie vnto Queene Katherine in that diuorce, are nothing ſo capitall, as her fauourers alledge them, at leaſt-wiſe if wee hold Pope Clement for an honeſt man; or his Cardinall Wolſey a ſure piller to be leaned vpon, who was a prime actor in the ſaid diuorce. To forward which, hee went Ambaſſadour into France, laden with Crownes, as Guiccharden ſaith, and with ſurpaſſing pompe, as London beheld, when with twelue hundred Horſe hee paſſed the Bridge for Amiens, there to negociate of this and other buſineſſes with Francis the French King.

Geng'caues. Learned men aſſembled to decide the Kings marriage.

(68) But the Cardinall of Yorke returned out of France, and now fearefull to wade too farre alone in theſe troubled waters, deſired the aſſiſtance of the learned in the Realme, and thereto got the Kings licence, which with his Legatine authoritie, commanded many learned men, both Diuines and Lawyers, from Oxford and Cambridge, with the preſence of many Biſhops beſides. Theſe aſſembled at London, were ſhewed the Inſtruments and Seales of many forraine Vniuerſities, all of them diſabling the marriage, and holding the diſpenſation (allowing it) vnlawfull: but becauſe that ſtring could not be touched without ſound of reproach to the Pope, as alſo to cleare the King from calumnious reports; it was thought fitteſt to ſend the ſaid inſtruments to Rome, whereunto theſe ſo appointed ſet their owne Seales, with an humble requeſt to his Holineſſe, that an indifferent Iudge might be ſent them, to determine this great and ſtrange cauſe of the King: which was ſo followed by his Ambaſſadors in the Popes Court, that Laurence Campius, a Cardinall of great credit and wiſedome, from their Conſiſtory was ſent into England, vnto whom, wiſe Wolſey Cardinall of Yorke was joyned in Commiſſion, with power to erect a Court, to heare the cauſe pleaded, and to giue ſentence definitiue as they found the equitie of law.

Cardinall Campius commeth into England.

(69) To that end therefore a place was ordained at the Blacke-Friers in London, and the King with the Queene remooued themſelues vnto his Palace of Bridewell neere adjoyning, whence ere long they were ſummoned by Proceſſe perſonally to appeare in Court, which accordingly they did, hauing ſeuerall Seats ordained vnder clothes of eſtate, mounted ſomewhat higher then the two Cardinals, the Preſidents, vnder whoſe feet ſate the Scribes and other Officers; the Court being framed Conſiſtory-wiſe, was furniſhed with Biſhops, Doctors, Lawyers, and learned Counſellors, in moſt ſolemne wiſe: the Doctors for the King, were Simpſon and Bell, and his Proctors Peter and Tregonell: for the Queene were Fiſher, Standiſh, and Ridley, a very little man, but a great Diuine: the Court thus ſet, and Commiſſion read, the Cryer called the King, by the name of King Henry to come into the Court, who forth-with anſwered and ſaid, Here. Then was the Queene called by the name of Queene Katherine to come into the Court, who made no anſwer at all, but preſently roſe vp, and going about the Court to the King, fell downe on her knees, before his feete, and in the hearing of the people, ſpake thus in effect:

The King and Queene ſummoned to appeare perſonally in the Court at Blacke-Friers.

"Sir, I deſire you to take ſome pitty "vpon me, and do me Iuſtice and Right: "I am a poore Woman, a ſtranger borne "out of your Dominions, hauing here "no indifferent Councell, and leſſe aſſu-"rance of friendſhip. Katherine to come into the Court; Madam, quoth her Guide, you are againe called. On, on, ſaid ſhee, it maketh no matter, this is no indifferent Court for mee, therefore goe forward.

Queene Katherine departed the Court.

was departed, preſently ſpake thus vnto

the King an humble requeſt, that his my Brethren here preſent will acknow-

Biſhop of Rocheſter, you neuer had my hand to that Inſtrument, nor neuer ſhall.
Indeed, ſaid Canterbury, you did it not your ſelfe, but admitted me to ſubſcribe your name, and allowed me your Seale.
Vnder your correction, ſaid Rocheſter, that is not ſo. Well, well, (quoth the King) you are but one man, againſt whom at this time we will not diſpute, and ſo roſe vp, and the Court adjourned vntill another day. Which was vpon the next following twentieth of May, the two Cardinals being ſet, the Lawyers were ready vpon either parts. Againſt the lawfulneſſe of the marriage, was alledged the other, formerly ſolemnized with Prince Arthur, the Kings elder Brother, and the Nuptiall knowledge of Lady Katherines body, which was vehemently proſecuted by the Kings learned Councell, by many reaſons and likelihoods of truth: one was, that Prince Henry had beene deferred from creation and title of Prince of Wales, the ſpace of ſixe moneths after Arthurs
deceaſe,

King Henries conſcience and care.

deceaſe, as doubtfull whether Lady Katherine had beene by him conceiued with childe; for which cauſe, as was alledged, the ſaid Lady had procured a ſecond Bull from the Pope, with this toleration, Vel forſan cognitam, and peraduenture carnally knowne: which Bull was onely purchaſed to diſpence with this marriage. That ſhe was carnally known, was vrged the report of his Chamberlaine, vpon certaine words ſpoken by Prince Arthur the firſt Morning that he roſe from her bed.

(71) The Negatiues denied all the preſumptions, eſpecially this laſt, as too far vnbeſeeming that reuerend Aſſembly and honourable Court. But by theſe Authenticall records which Mr. Foxe had in his cuſtody, the matter is paſt all contradiction for her carnall knowledge, where it is affirmed, that the Ambaſſadors of Ferdinando, being in England to ſee the ſame marriage conſummated, returned their knowledge of their mutuall conjunction, as that nothing was left vnperformed of any nuptiall right; and they being of yeeres able to explete the act, he aboue fifteene, and ſhe aboue ſeuenteene, laid both in one bed almoſt fiue moneths together, doe aſſure vs the certainty of that, which they made their greateſt doubt, vnleſſe the Popes diſpenſation was a Core to the cauſe. But that ſhee was carnally knowne, the Vniuerſitie of Padua had concluded in their ſentence, whom the Emperours Ambaſſadors earneſtly ſollicited, either to retract their ſaid Grant, or to giue forth a new Sentence vpon the caſe, that the Queene was not carnaliter cognita ab illuſtriſsimo Principe Arthuro, or to determine that this Matrimony was not dirimendum, which in no wiſe they could obtaine, though they offered very largely to haue it done. Thus from day to day the pleas proceeded, but nothing concluded touching the diuorce; whereupon the King ſent the two Cardinals to perſwade with the Queene to put the whole matter onely to himſelfe, which would be farre better, and more honourable for her, then to ſtand to the tryall of Law.

(72) Theſe Legates accordingly repaired to Bridewell, and in the Preſence ſtaied for the Queene, who preſently from among her Maids at worke came forth vnto them, hauing a skeine of white thread about her necke; at whoſe ſight ſhe ſaid, Alacke, my Lords, I am very ſorry to make you attend vpon mee; What is your will? If it pleaſe your Grace, (quoth Cardinall Wolſey) to goe into your Priuy-Chamber, we will deliuer the cauſe of our comming. My Lord (quoth ſhe) this place is moſt fit, I pray you therefore declare here your minds. With that he began his ſpeech in Latine, which ſhe preſently interrupted, ſaying, that ſhe vnderſtood the Engliſh very wel.

Wolſeys ſpeech to the Queene.

"(73) Madam (quoth the Cardinall) "we are come in good will, to know "your Graces minde, in this great mat-"ter of your Marriage, and to giue you "our aduice with the beſt ſeruice wee "can. My Lords (ſaid ſhe) I thanke you, "but for anſwer of my reſolution, I can-"not ſo ſuddenly make; the cauſe is great, "and toucheth me very neere; I am here "a ſtranger, a poore woman, lacking wit, "not able to anſwer ſuch noble and wiſe "Perſonages as yee be, I haue need of "counſell, and they be in Spaine; for "thinke you, my Lords, that any Eng-"liſh ſubjects will bee for mee againſt "the King? forſooth, I know they will "not, I pray your Lordſhips be good "vnto mee, a forrainer and deſtitute of "friends, and aſſiſt me with your coun-"ſels, which I will be glad to heare. And thereupon taking them by the hands, led them into her Chamber, where they ſtayed ſomewhat long; which done, they departed, and made relation of her anſwer vnto the King. Who nothing pleaſed at the anſwer ſhee made them, ſent againe certaine Lords vnto her, to ſhew her the determinations of thoſe Chriſtian Vniuerſities, who had preſcribed the marriage vnlawfull, and to wiſh her to remit the matter for the quieting of the Kings conſcience vnto foure Prelates, and foure temporall Lords: Vnto whom ſhee anſwered, ſaying, "The "King my Father which concluded my "marriage, I am ſure was not ſo ignorant, "but he asked counſell of Clerkes and "well-learned men, before hee married "mee the ſecond time: for if he had had "any doubt in my marriage, he would "not haue diſburſed ſo great a treaſure as "he did, and then all the Doctors agreed "my marriage to be good; inſomuch that "the Pope himſelfe, which knew beſt "what was to be done, did both diſpence "and ratifie the ſecond marriage, againſt "whoſe doings I maruell that any per-"ſon will ſpeake or write. But as tou-"ching the determinations of the Vni-"uerſities, I am a woman, and lacke wit and

"and learning to answer to them, but "to God I commit the judgement of "that, whether they haue done justly or "partially: for this I am sure, that nei-"ther the Kings Father, nor my Father "would haue condiscended to our mar-"riage, if it had beene declared to be vn-"lawfull; and where you say, I should "put the cause to eight persons of this "Realme for quietnesse of the Kings "conscience; I pray God send his Grace "a quiet conscience: and this shall bee "your answer, that I say I am his law-"full wife, and to him lawfully married, "and by the order of the holy Church, "I was to him espoused as his true wife, "(although I was so vnworthy) and in "that point I will abide, till the Court "of Rome, which was priuy to the be-"ginning, haue made thereof a determi-"nation and finall end.

King Henry prosecuteth his diuorce.

(74) The King then hopelesse of his Queenes consent, hasted his Lawyers to forward their diuorce, which dayly they did, and the Consistory at Black-Fryers daily frequented, all points in Law were opened to the full, so that nothing now remained but the sentence of the Iudges: for which a solemne day was assigned, when the King in person came to heare it himselfe. His seat taken, and the Court set, after a crie for silence, the proceedings were openly read, and all doubts cleared, the learned Councell at Barre called for Iudgement: whereunto Campius, the Popes stout Champion, vpon his stiffe gouty legges stood vp, all men expecting the sentence of Diuorce: but the Cardinall now not to learne what he had formerly determined, said flatly, "I will not giue iudgement "in this matter, too high for vs, conside-"ring the estates of the Persons, and the "doubtfulnesse of the occasions alled-"ged, vntill I haue made a full relation "to the Popes Holinesse of all our pro-"ceedings, whose counsell and com-"mandement in this case I will obserue "and follow, vnder whose authority we "sit and are Commissioners, therefore "I will adjourne the Court for this "time, according to the order of the "Court of Rome, from whence our sem-"blable jurisdiction is deriued. Which, how it displeased the King, the Sequell will shew, and how then taken, the words of the Duke of Suffolke did well declare, who stepping forth, with a sterne countenance vsed these words; "It was "neuer merry in England, since we haue "had any Cardinals among vs.

Cardinall Campius referreth the cause of diuorce to the iudgement of the Pope.

The saying of the Duke of Suffolke.

The Iudgement thus staid, the King sent his Secretary Stephen Gardiner to Rome, to follow that Court, whether Queene Katherine had made her appeale: and Cardinall Campius admitted to depart, went away in no such estate as was held fit for a man of his place, but rather as one suspected to carry with him more then his owne, had all his Chests searched at Callis, euen to the Cloke-bags and Males. The cause of this stay (saith Sleidan) was, that the French King, an entire friend vnto Rome, had no better successe in Naples, against the Emperour, whom the Pope durst not displease, the Lady Katherine being his Aunt, for whom the Emperour was so earnest, as in her behalfe he laboured Millan and many other places, that their learned men should not determine against the said Queene. But whatsoeuer the cause was, that Campius denied his sentence for the Diuorce, certaine it is, that Cardinall Wolsey fell likewise in great displeasure of the King, though he sought to excuse himselfe with want of sufficient authority: but now his Sunne hauing passed the Meridian of his greatnesse, began by degrees againe to decline, till lastly it set vnder the cloud of his fatall eclipse.

The cause why Campius stayed sentence.

(75) Formerly we haue spoken of the rising of this man, who now being swoln so bigge by the blasts of promotion, as the bladder not able to containe more greatnesse, suddenly burst, and vented forth the winde of all former fauours. Vaine-glorious he was, in state, in dyet, and in rich furniture for house, and in prodigall intertainements, more like to a Prince then a Prelate, attended with so many officers, and seruants, as is almost incredible, were not his Check-roll yet to be seene. At his Masse he was serued by Dukes, and Earles, who tooke the assay of his wine on their knees, and held him his Bason at the Lauatory. And being Ambassadour vnto the Emperour at Brussels, was there waited vpon by many Noble-men of England, and serued at Table by his seruitors vpon their knees, to the great admiration of the Germanes which beheld it: and indeed so much ouer-topped the Pompe of a spirituall function, as he seemed to the more humble, to bee mad for ioy; and him doth Campian judge, rather to be a Bastard of some Prince, then the sonne of a Butcher; so moulded for the one, and

and ſo farre mounting from the other: exceedingly wiſe he was, and very well ſpoken, but full of reuenge, and vicious of body, thrall to affection, and lulled aſleepe with flattery, inſatiable to get, but princely in beſtowing, lofty to his enemies, and not eaſily reconciled, which haſtened his fall, when he firſt began to ſlip. Queene Katherine in her cauſe, did grieuouſly accuſe him; the Councell for their parts did article againſt him; the Law found him in a Premunire vnto the King; and Sir Thomas Moore in the high Court of Parliament, inueighed bitterly againſt him.

(76) The firſt ſtep of his deſcent was his diſlike of the Kings affection vnto Anne Bullen, a Gentlewoman nothing fauourable to his Pontificall Pompe, nor no great follower of the Rites of thoſe times, which moued the Cardinall (the Pope hauing aſſumed the ſentence of Queene Katherines cauſe vnto himſelfe) to write vnto his Holineſſe to deferre the judgement of Diuorce, till hee had wrought the Kings minde in another mould. This was not done ſo ſecretly, but that it came to the Kings eare, and laſtly coſt the proud Cardinall his life. For the broad Seale firſt taken from him, and his other Biſhopricks elſewhere beſtowed, his Houſe and furniture ſeazed vpon, and himſelfe remooued into the North, at Cawood-caſtle ſeuen miles from Yorke, was ſuddenly arreſted (for arrogãt words importing a deſire of reuengement, ſaith Sleidan) by the Earle of Northumberland, whence he was conueied toward London by the Lieutenant of the Tower, in which journey at Leiceſter Abbey hee ended his life, whoſe death himſelfe had haſtened by taking an ouer-much quantity of a confection to breake winde from off his ſtomacke, and in that Church was there enterred.

(77) The grudges againſt this Cardinall were many and great, not onely for the eſpeciall fauour hee ſtood in with the King, and great ſtroake hee bare at Councell-Boord, (both which commonly breed emulation vnto the man ſo eſtated) but for his intolerable pillings, who to patch vp his pride in the raiſing of his new Colledges, erected at Oxford and Ipſwich, by the licence of Pope Clement 7. ſuppreſſed fortie Monaſteries of good fame, and bountifull Hoſpitalitie, conuerting all their goods and moueables into his owne Coffers; which were ſo ſtuffed with treaſure, that twelue Barrels full of Gold and Siluer were laid aſide, to ſerue the Pope in his warres. As alſo that hee emptied the Land of twelue-ſcore thouſand pound, inforced by him from the King. All which hee conuerted to releeue, and ranſome the Pope then in Priſon, to the great impoueriſhing of his Majeſties Coffers. That his owne reuenewes by his faculties, licences, and other legantine exactions, did equalize the Kings yeerely Reuenewes, and laſtly his pride ſo intolerable, as no leſſe then twelue hundred Horſe for his retinue, foureſcore Waggons for his carriage, and threeſcore Mules for ſumpter-Horſes, attended him into France. But ſic tranſit gloria mundi, for the higheſt flood is ſubject to an ebbe.

(78) But whileſt the matter of the Kings marriage hung thus in ſuſpence the ſpace of two yeeres, and other Ambaſſadors intended to be ſent vnto Rome: it chanced Doctor Cranmar, Doctor Stephens, and Doctor Foxe to meete at Waltham at one Table, where the two latter, great Agents for the King, fell in diſcourſe of his cauſe, by tearmes and ſtrength of the Ciuill-Law. Well, ſaid Doctor Cranmar, if I might be heard, I thinke much better it might be tried by Gods Law: whereby the King ſhould be ſurer ſettled in the cauſe of his Conſcience, then thus to be poſted off with delayes from yeere to yeere. This ſpeech Doctor Foxe made knowne to his Majeſtie, which ſounded very tuneably in his eare: then was Cranmar ſent for, conferred with by the King, and commanded to write his minde in the matter, but with this caution prefixed, not to reſpect the perſons but the cauſe; who to him commended the vertuous perfections of his Queene, with whom aboue all others he moſt deſired to continue, if their marriage could be made warrantable by Gods Lawes: to which end hee commended the care of Bookes, and of his other Prouiſions vnto the Earle of Wiltſhire at Durham Place. The Doctor thus ſet on worke, when he leaſt looked to be ſo imployed, prooued by Scriptures, Generall Councels, Ancient Writers, beſides the preſent, and his owne opinion, That the Biſhop of Rome had no authoritie to diſpence with the Word of God, nor the Scriptures.

(79) The Treatiſe thus finiſhed, he preſented it to the King, which when he had well read, and weighed the ſubſtance therein therein contained; Will you (quoth he) Maſter Doctor, abide by what you haue writ? That will I by Gods Grace, ſaid Cranmar, euen before the Pope himſelfe, if your Majeſty wil ſo aſſigne it. Marry, quoth the King, to him ſhall you goe. Whereupon Thomas Bullen Earle of Wiltſhire, Doctor Stokeſley, Elect of London, Doctor Lee the Kings Almoner, the Doctors Crane, Bennet, and Cranmar, were ſent to the Pope then at Bononie in Italy. The day approached for audience of their Ambaſſage, and the high Prelate ſet vpon his Throne of Eſtate, the Doctor prepared to make his Oration in defence of what hee had writ, when on the ſudden hee was interrupted by an vnmannerly ſpaniell of the Earles, who ſeeing the Pope put forth his foot to be kiſt, caught in his teeth the Pontificals great Toe, ſo that theſe Ambaſſadours diſdaining to kiſſe where the Dogge had taken an aſſay, let the Pope draw backe his foot, and ſo loſt that eſpeciall fauour offered vnto them. The Propoſition then made, that no man, jure diuino, could or ought to marry his Brothers Wife, and that the Biſhop of Rome by no meanes could diſpence to the contrary, was replied vnto, that it ſhould be anſwered at more leiſure, when his Holineſſe returned to Rome; in the meane while, to grace Cranmar the more, he gratified him with the office of the Penitenciariſhip, and ſo diſmiſſed the Ambaſſadors: who all, ſauing Cranmar, returned to England; but hee tooke his way towards the Emperour, (to whom the cauſe ſomewhat appertained) being then at Vienna in his expedition againſt the Turke, vnto whoſe learned men he offered diſputation, and in priuate conference ſo ſatisfied Cornelius Agrippa, the moſt reſpected for learning in the Emperours Court, as hee held the Propoſition moſt true. Whereupon, others learned, were diſcouraged to diſpute, and ſuffered Cranmar to depart without any further proceedings.

(80) The matter thus manifeſted in moſt parts of Chriſtendome, this Gordians knot was laſtly vnlooſed by King Henry himſelfe, who now beſides this his marriage, began to call in queſtion, what authority the Pope had in his dominions, which being afterwards debated in Parliament, an Act paſſed againſt his vſurped Hierarchy, and all perſons forbidden to appeale, or to make any paiments vnto Rome. The Kings marriage with Lady Katherine, was by the ſame Parliament diſſolued, and his ſeparation from her, made by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to ſtand good, and effectuall by Law, and that Queene Katherine from thence-forth ſhould be called Princeſſe Dowager, which doings ſhe tooke ſo to heart, as ſhee procured the Popes curſe againſt King Henry and his Realme, which curſe was ſet vp at Dunkirke in Flanders, for that the bringer thereof durſt come no neerer. And the Pope in reuenge of himſelfe, being ſet in his Conſiſtory accompanied with his Cardinals, proceeded to the Cenſure of theſe great Princes marriage, which hee then adjudged to ſtand moſt firme and Canonicall, and injoyned King Henry to hold matrimoniall ſocietie with the ſaid Katherine his lawfull Wife and Queene, and in that eſtate to account and maintaine her as it became a King and louing Husband to doe, and if hee refuſed to accompliſh theſe premiſſes, then to be compelled thereunto, and neuer after to be heard in any Court, as touching the inualidity of the ſaid marriage, and to pay the expences of the ſaid trauerſe, as he the holy Father ſhould limit and thinke meet. This was done a yeere after that the King had married Queene Anne, and bare date from Rome, the 23. of March and yeere of Chriſt, 1534. When afterwards King Henry ſet his affection vpon the Lady Anne Bullen, a Phœnix indeed in his Princely eye, & another Heſter for Englands ſaluation, both in her ſelfe and royall Bud ſucceeding, as the Heauens and World doe witneſſe to this day. She was the daughter of Sir Thomas Bullen Viſcount Rochford, Earle of Wiltſhire, and of Lady Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke. This Earle Thomas her father was the ſonne of Sir William Bullen, whoſe Wife was Lady Margaret, the ſecond daughter and Coheire of Thomas Butler Earle of Ormond, and the ſaid Sir William was the ſonne of Sir Godfrey Bullen Lord Major of London, who lyeth buried in S^t. Laurence Church in the Iewry, pictured in his winding ſheete vpon a plate of Braſſe, and about his Graue-ſtone vpon a border of Braſſe in many places theſe words are written, Now thus, Now thus, Now thus, whoſe Charitie was extended vpon the poore Houſholders of that Citie, in diſtributing among them a thou-

Vpon S. Erkenwalds day, saith Hollinshead and Grafton.

K. Henry married Anne Bullen.

(83) The Romanists much fearing that Babel would downe, if Queene Anne might bee heard against wicked * Haman, sought to vnder-proppe the foundations therof, with certaine deuices of their owne; and that the same might passe without note of suspition, they layd their forgery euen vpon Heauen it selfe; whose pretended Oracle Elizabeth Barton (commonly called, the holy Maide of Kent) was made to be; and the pillers of this godlesse Fabricke were Edward Bocking, a Monke by profession, and Doctor of Diuinitie, Richard Masters, Parson of Aldington, the Towne wherein she dwelt, Richard Deering a Monke, Hugh Rich a Frier, Iohn Adestone, and Thomas Abell, Priests, put to their helping hands, and Henry Gould Bachelour of Diuinitie, with Iohn Fisher the Reuerend Father of Rochester, imployed their paines to dawb these downfalling walles, with their vntempered Morter. The Scribes that set their pens for her Miracles, were Edward Thwaites Gentleman, and Thomas Lawrence Register, besides Haukherst a Monke, who writ a Letter that was forged to be sent her from Heauen; and Richard Risby and Thomas Gould, were the men which dispersed her Miracles abroad to the world. This holy maide Elizabeth made a Votarisse in Canterbury, was taught by Bocking her ghostly Father, and suspected Paramour, to counterfeit many fained trances, and in the same to vtter many vertuous words for the rebuke of sin, vnder which, more freely shee was heard against Luthers Doctrine, and the Scriptures translation, then desired of many: neither so onely, but that she gaue forth from God, and his Saints, by sundry suggestiue Reuelations, that if the King proceeded in his diuorce, and second marriage, he should not raigne in his Realme one moneth after, nor rest in Gods fauour the space of an houre. But the truth discouered by Gods true Ministers, this Oracle gaue place as all other such did, when Christ by his death stopped their lying mouthes: for her selfe and * seuen of her Disciples were executed for Treason at Tiborne, and the other sixe put to their fines and imprisonment. With the like counterfeit reuelations and fained predictions this Generation of Hypocrites had brought Edward Lord Stafford, Duke of Buckingham vnto his vnhappy end, when as by the working of Iohn de la Court, his owne owne Confeſſor, together with Nicholas Hopkins a Monke of the Carthuſian Order, in the Priory of Henton in Somerſetſhire, who by his viſions from heauen forſooth, heartned him for the Crowne; but before his owne Coronet could aſpire to that top, hee worthily loſt both head and all vpon Tower-hill for his treaſon, Anno Domini 1521. Vnto ſuch ſinnes the world was then ſubiect, and into ſuch conceits their reputed holineſſe had brought them, not onely among the ſimple and vnlettered, but euen with them that ſeemed to be learned indeed: for by certaine predictions foreſhewing a great Deluge, Prior Bolton of Saint Bartholomewes in London, was ſo fearefull, that hee built him a houſe vpon the height of Harrow-hill, ſtoring it with prouiſions neceſſary, to keepe himſelfe from drowning, in Anno Dom. 1524.

(84) But the Popes Holineſſe fearing the euent of the game, if euery man might ſet and caſt at his Crown, thought it high time to lay hand on his owne ſtake, and to keepe what was left, leſt all would be gone; to which end he ſollicited many Chriſtian Princes to ſtand on his part, and among them ſent his Briefe vnto Iames the fift King of Scotland, deſiring his aſſiſtance againſt King Henry of England, whom in his Conſiſtory he had pronounced to be an Hereticke, a Schiſmaticke, a manifeſt Adulterer, a publike Murtherer, a committer of Sacriledge, a Rebell, and conuict of Læſæ Maieſtatis, for that he had riſen againſt him who was his Lord. And therefore hee had iuſtly depriued him of his ſaid Kingdome, and would diſpoſe the ſame to him and other Princes, ſo as they would aſſiſt to recouer the ſame: a very good prouiſion, and very well foreſeene; for notwithſtanding theſe boiſterous blaſts from Rome, the King kept his Crowne, and was rather feared of the Popes beſt Abetters, then did feare any potent power that the world could afford, whoſe thoughts were now buſied for the Coronation of his Queene.

(86) True it is, that the zealous conuerſation of this godly Queene gaue great encouragements vnto many, more publikely with boldneſſe to profeſſe the Goſpell; ſo that the Miniſters formerly fled in caſe of Religion, returned againe into England, where the new Teſtament (tranſlated by Tyndall) was read, but with ſuch diſlikes to the Biſhops, that they got it to bee burnt. Notwithſtanding, to tickle the Kings eare, they preached againſt the Popes ſupremacy, and tooke the Oath for the King themſelues; aboliſhed his authority by Act of Parliament, and ſuppreſſed many Monaſteries; leauing their reuenewes to the Kings will: faire introductions indeed for what they intended, as the ſequell of the ſixe Articles by them procured, doth manifeſtly ſhew: and thoſe purpoſely made againſt the maintainers of the Goſpell, whereof Queene Anne was the chiefe; who firſt was moſt fauourable to thoſe learned Diuines, that laide mans ſaluation vpon the Rocke Chriſt; next, in procuring a toleration from the King for them, whoſe doctrine did dayly vndermine the Papall foundation: and laſtly, ſhee by no meanes would conſent to marry the King, vntill a lawfull diuorce was had for his ſeparation from Lady Katherine, his brother Arthurs Wife, which thing this Pope greatly withſtood: theſe were cauſes ſufficient to moue his Holineſſe to bend his brow, and by his Inſtruments in Court to cut off this Principall mouer, who foreſlowing no time, tooke the Ball before his rebound.

her knees before Thomas Audley Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Norfolke; and Thomas Cromwell, Secretary, her bringers, desiring God so to helpe her, as she was guiltlesse of those things whereof she was accused, beseeching those Lords to be Petitioners vnto his Majestie in her behalfe, who lamenting her case, left her Prisoner with Sir William Kingston Constable of the place.

(88) I will in no wise excuse her guilt, hauing had judgement and death by law, though others, and that vpon just occasions before me haue done, but will speake from them what they haue said; and namely one, that wrote thereof vnto a worthy and reuerent person; in whose defence his words are these: It seemeth very plaine, that the crimes supposed against this Christian Queene Anne, were matters contriued by the deuice of the Pope, and his instruments, her enemies. None of them all that were accused in the same Treason, confessing the act euen vnto death, but haue left direct Testimonies in writing to the contrary; one meane Groome excepted, namely, Marke Smeton, made confession vpon some promise of life belike, but had his head cut off before hee was aware, or had time to recall what he had said. The like did Cromwell the Secretary signifie to the King, after the prisoners had beene throughly examined in the Tower by the Councell, who wrote thus in his letter on the same day; Many things haue beene objected, but nothing confessed, onely some circumstances haue beene acknowledged by Marke. And so doth Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury in his Letter of comfort vnto the King, who sore lamented that such a Starre was falne, if her guilt could be prooued, and willed his Highnesse to stand in defence of the Gospell, as shee had done, without any report of confessing or acknowledging any such Acts as were objected, which as Sleiden writeth, were Adultery, and inceste, but vnjustly (saith he) as it is supposed and prooued since: With her were executed certaine Gentlemen of the Kings Priuie Chamber, namely, Norris, Weston, Brewton, and one Marks, which contrary to his conscience (as it is reported) for hope of preferment subscribed to a Bill, whereby hee condemned both himselfe, and all the rest.

(89) For vpon the seuenth of May, her brother George Bullen, Lord Rochford, for his supposed offence with these foure before named, were all of them beheaded vpon the Tower hill, but none of them confessing the action. I haue heard it reported, that Rochford the Queenes brother comming to her bed side to solicite a suite, leaned thereupon to whisper her in the eare, which the Spials gaue forth that he did so, to kisse the Queene, howsoeuer, they are dead; and the Queene must die, who two daies before had beene arraigned in the Tower, the Duke of Norfolke being her Iudge; to her inditement shee answered so effectually, that shee seemed to cleare all matters laid to her charge; yet was she found guilty, and vpon the nineteenth day of May was brought to a Scaffold erected on the Greene within the said Tower, where, in the presence of many Noblemen, the Lord Major of London, the Sheriffes, and some principall Commoners, shee is said to haue spoken these words in their presence.

" (90) Good Christian people, I am "come hither to die; for according to the "Law, and by the Law, I am judged to "death, and therefore I will speake no- "thing against it; I come hither to ac- "cuse no man, nor to speake any thing "of that whereof I am accused and con- "demned; as for mine owne offences "God knoweth them, & vnto God I re- "mit them, beseeching him to haue mer- "cy vpon my soule; and if any person "will meddle in my cause, I desire them "to judge the best; and so I take my "leaue of the world, and of you all, and "heartily doe beseech you to pray for "me; and I beseech Iesus saue my Sou- "raigne and Master the King, the most "godliest, noblest, and gentlest Prince "that is, long to raigne ouer you. So mercifull ſhe was to the poore, that ſhe ſpent almoſt her whole reuenew for their reliefe, and in nine moneths ſpace diſtributed among them to the value of fifteene thouſand pounds, intending likewiſe to beſtow a great ſtocke into the foure quarters of the Realme, to ſet poore Artificers on worke. (93) And by the working of the ſame faith, her penancy was ſeene, in her ſorrowes conceiued, and thirſting reconciliation vnto them whom ſhee had any wiſe offended, as by this worthy example is apparant; when the day before ſhe ſuffered death, being attended vpon with ſixe Ladies in the Tower, ſhe tooke the Lady Kingſton into her Preſence-Chamber, and there locking the doore vpon them, willed her to ſit down in the Chaire of Eſtate: whereunto ſhe anſwered, that it was her duty to ſtand, and not to ſit at all in her preſence, much leſſe vpon the ſeat and ſtate of her, her Queene. Ah Madam, quoth ſhe, that Title is gone, I am a condemned perſon, and by law haue no eſtate left me in this life; but for clearing of my conſcience, I pray you ſit downe. Well, ſaid the Lady Kingſton, I haue often plaid the foole in my youth, and to fulfill your command, I will doe it once more in mine age, and thereupon ſate downe vnder the cloth of Eſtate; which no ſooner was done, but that the Queene moſt humbly fell vpon her knees before her, and with teares, holding vp her hands, charged her in the preſence of God and his Angels, as ſhee would anſwer her before them, when all ſhould appeare in judgement, that ſhe ſhould ſo fall downe before the Lady Maries Grace, her Daughter in Law; and in her name in like manner, aske her forgiueneſſe for the wrongs ſhe had done her, for till that was accompliſhed (ſhee ſaid) her conſcience could not bee quiet: what her offence was to her-ward, we know not, but may bee ſuppoſed not to bee capitall, the Queenes caſe wayed, the time conſidered, and her enemies none of the meaneſt; onely this I obſerue, that as ſhee cleared her conſcience of the leſſer crimes, ſo vndoubtedly would ſhee haue done of the greater, if any had beene committed; and ſo as her ſelfe inſtantly deſired, I commit her caſe to be charitably ſpoken of, and leaue her and them vnto the Lord.

(94) But as one pillar for the Goſpels defence was falne by the death of Queene Anne, ſo another was raiſed, by raiſing Cromwell from the baſe of his birth, no better indeed then a Blackeſmiths ſonne, who ſeruing great Wolſey in the office of his Sollicitor, was imployed by him for the ſuppreſſion of forty Monaſteries, to the erection of his Colledges at * Oxford and Ipſwich; by which hee mounted thoſe ſteps of eſtate, which ſet (but not kept) him in the high chaire of his authoritie; firſt by King Henry he was made Maſter of his Iewell-houſe, then Baron of Okeham in Rutlandſhire, then Knight of the Garter, ere long was created Earle of Eſſex, then was hee made Lord great Chamberlaine, and laſtly ordained the Kings Vicar Generall; and thus farre fortune brought him from the Forge for a fall.

Commotions of Lincolneſhire.

To the King our Soueraigne Lord.

Pleaſeth it your Highneſſe to be aduertiſed, that your poore Comminalty, true and faithfull Subjects, in your County of Lincolne, at this preſent time aſſembled, findeth our ſelues grieued in theſe Articles hereafter following.

The aggreeuances of the Commons of Lincolneſhire.

Firſt, for the ſuppreſſion of ſo many religious houſes, as bee at this inſtant time ſuppreſſed. Whereby the ſeruice of God is not onely miniſhed, but alſo the poorealty of your Realme be vnrelieued, and many perſons be put from their liuings, and left at large, which wee thinke is a great hindrance to the Common-wealth.

Suppreſſion of Monaſteries.

The ſecond Article is, that we humbly beſeech your Grace, that the Act of vſes may be repealed, becauſe we thinke that by the ſaid Act we be clearely reſtrained of our liberties, in the declaration of our Wills, concerning our lands: aſwell for the paiment of our debts, for doing of your Grace ſeruice, as for helping and relieuing of our children, which we haue had by the ſufferance of your lawes by a long continuance, which as we thinke is great hurt and diſcommodity to the Common-wealth.

Act of Vſes.

The third Article is, that where your Grace hath a Taxe, or quindecim, granted vnto you by Act of Parliament, payable the next yeere: which is, and euer hath beene leueable of ſchepe and catall: And the ſchepe and catall of your Subiects within this ſaid Shire, are now at this inſtant vtterly decayed and gone. Whereby yff your Grace will take the ſaid taxe, Your ſaid Subiects ſhould be conſtrained to pay iiij.d. for a beaſt, and xij. d. for xx. ſchepe: And that would bee an importunate charge to theym, conſidered the pouerty that they be in already, and the loſſe which they haue ſuſtained theſe two yeeres by-paſt.

Taxe of quindecim.

The fowrt Article is, that wee your true and faithfull Subiects, thynkes that your Grace takes of your Councell, and very nygh about you, ſuch Perſonages as be of lawe birth, and ſmale reputation, which haue procured the premyſſes, moſt eſpeciall for their ſingler lucre and aduantage: the which we ſuſpect to be the Lord Cromwell, and Sir Richard Rich Chanceller of the augmentations.

Counſellors diſliked.

The fift Article is, your Grace to haue the x^th^. and firſt fruites of euery ſpirituall promotion, of the value of xx.^l^. and aboue. And of all other vnder the ſaide value which doe not keepe reſidence and hoſpitality of their ſaid Benefices.

Tenths of ſpirituall liuings.

The ſixt Article is, that wee your true Subiects finde them grieued, that there bee diuers Biſhops of Yngland, of your Grace late promotion, that haue ſubuertyd the faith of Criſt, as wee thinke, which is the Archbyſhop of Canterburie, the Biſhoppe of Rocheſter, the Byſhop of Salisbury, the Biſhop of Saint Daueys, and the Biſhop of Deuelyn. And in eſpeciall as wee thinke the beginning of all the troble of this Realme, and the gret exactions that hath beene taken of your poore Communalty, haue riſen by the occaſion of the Biſhop of Lincolne: by whoſe Officers, and by other of the Lord Cromwels ſeruants, a great rumor and noyſe is riſen, and the commune voce is, that ſuch Iowellys, Plate, and other anornaments of our Pariſh Churches, which wee occupy in the ſeruice and honour of God, ſhould be taken from vs, and ſpoiled in like maner and facion, as the houſys of Religion hath bene. For a reformation of all and ſyngler the aforeſayd abvſes, We your poore and trewe Subiects humble reguirys your Grace and Maieſty, Diſlike of Biſhops.

Maiesty, that it might please your Highnesse to call vnto you the Nobility of this your Realme, to see such Order and direction concerning all and singler the premisses, as may stand with honour and sewerty of your Grace, the welthe and prosperity of your Realme, and the contentation of vs your poore Subiects, and other the whole Communalty of this your Realme. Whereby wee shall not onely accept your Grace to be the Head and Soueraigne of vs your Subiects, but also accept and take your Grace to bee Supreame Head of the Church of Yngland, which wee doe knowledge your Grace trewe inheritance and right.

The Commons requeſt for the bearer.

Also your said trewe and faithfull subiects, with the hole assent of all your Communalty of the saide Shire, most humbly besechith your gracious Maiesty, to perdon this poore bearer in doing this his message to your Highnesse, who is your trewe and faithfull subiect, and hath taken this message vpon him for the feruent loue that he hath to your Grace most in especiall, and for the staying of your Cominaltie euer sens this ruffull began, hath bene as glad with all his diligence to stay the commune people for the effusion of blood, as be all his powre hee might. The King with good words pacified these Commons, who laying aside weapons, imbraced their pardons.

Commotions in Yorkeshire.

(96) But this cloud scarsly ouerblowne, another more dangerous arose in the North, which threatned soarer stormes by the Skies ouer-cast: for 40000. Rusticks assembled in Yorkshire, furnished with Horse, Armour, Artillery, and Abillements for warre, threatned to set the stay of Estate vpon the props of their giddy inuentions. Their pretence was Religion, and defence of holy Church, their Banners painted with the fiue wounds of our Lord, the Challice, the Cake, and other like inuentions of Rome, and vpon their sleeues was writ the name of the Lord: and so forward and feruent were they in their proceedings, that this their attempt must be termed the holy Pilgrimage. Neither were the Rurall only guilty in this rebellion, but others of greater place and degree were associates, namely, Edward Lord Archbishop of Yorke, and the Lord Thomas Darcy, though both of them constrained by the Rebels, as the said Archbishop testified vnder his owne hand: but voluntary and most forward were the Clergy of those parts, the Lord Lumley, Sir Thomas and Sir William Percies, Sir Robert Constable, Sir Francis Bigot, and Sir Robert Neuill, all of them Knights, Iohn Lacy, Richard Beamond, and Robert Bowes Esquiers; the Bayliffes of Snaythe, of Leeds, Kellam, and of Beuerly. And for Captaine-Generall, was Robert Aske a meane Gentleman, and one Rudstone his associate in the Field. Other Commanders they had out of the common sort, as Iames Diamond Generall of the Foot, and a poore Fisherman, styled by himselfe and others, the Earle of Pouerty. What authoritie these bare among these rude multitude may partly be perceiued by their Mandates, and Commissions, sent forth in their names, and subscribed with their owne hands, as from the Originals of some of them is here to be seene.

Holy Pilgrimage.

The Captaine of the Commotions Letters.

Lords, Knights, Masters, Kinsmen, and Friends, wee perceiue that yee be informed that this Assemble our Pilgrimage, which we by the fauour and mercy of Almighty God intendyth to proceed in, is because the King our Souerayne Lord hath had much inpocessions of vs, wee doubt not but yee doe knowne and remember that to our powers wee haue beene alwaies as ready in paiments and seruices to his Highnesse as any his subiects: and further to acertaine you of the cause of our said assemble and pilgrimage is this, That forsomuch that such simple and euill-disposed persons being of the Kings Councell, hath not only incensed his Grace with many things which be contrary to the Faith of God, honour of the Kings Majesty, and the Commonwealth of this Realme: and thereby hath destroyed, and yet vtterly intendeth to destroy the Church of England, and the Ministers of the same, as yee know so well as wee: but also the said Councell hath robbed and spoiled, and further intendyth vtterly to rob and spoile the whole body of the Kings Realme, and that as well all you, as vs, if God of his infinite mercy had not caused such as hath taken, and hereafter shall take this pilgrimage vpon them to proceed in the same: and whether all these things be true or not, we put it to your conscience. And if ye thinke it be true, and fight against vs, which intendeth the Comen-wealth of this Realme, and nothing else, wee trust yee shall haue small speed: For this pilgrimage wee haue taken hyt for the preseruation of Chrysts Church of this Realme of England, the King our Souerayne Lord, the Nobility,

Barony,

Barony and Comens of the ſame, and to the intent to make petition to the Kings Highneſſe for reformation of that which is amiſſe within this his Realme. And for puniſhment of Heretickes & Subuerters of Lawys; and neither for money, malice, nor diſpleaſure to any perſon, but ſuch as be not worthy to remaine neere the King our Soueraine Lords perſon. And further we know if ye ſhould obtaine, as we truſt yn God ye ſhall natt, then ye put both vs and you, your heires and ours in bondage for euer; and further yee are ſure of the interdiction of Cryſts curſe, and wee cleare, and out of the ſame: And if we ouercome you, yee ſhall bee in our wylls; wherefore for a concluſion, if you wyll not comen with vs for a reformation of the Premiſes, wee certifie you by this our writing, that we will feyght and dye, both againſt you, and all thoſe that ſhall bee aboutwards to ſtop vs in the ſaid pilgrimage: And God ſhall ſhew his Grace and mercy therein: And then ye ſhall be judged hereafter to be ſhedars of ſome of Cryſtyn bloud, and deſtroyers of your euyn Cryſten. From Robert Aske, chiefe Captaine of the Comynalty aſſembled in pilgrimage, for the Barony and Cominalty of the ſame.

By me Robert Aske yn the name of all the Comynalty and Barony.

Of ſuch terrour and haughty ſpirit was this Captaine Aske, that when Lancaſter an Herald at Armes, was ſent to declare the Kings meſſage in Pomfret Caſtle (which the Rebels had got by ſurrender from the Lord Darcy) he ſo bluſtred out his anſwers, that the daunted man excuſing himſelfe to be but a meſſenger, fell before him on his knees; till the Archbiſhop of Yorke tooke him vp, ſaying, It was not beſeeming the Coate he wore, to proſtrate to any, but only to his Soueraigne. Reade likewiſe if you pleaſe, this ſtrange Mandate from ſome meane man among them; the falſe ſuggeſtion that they poſſeſſed the ignorant with, and the Oath whereunto theſe holy Pilgrims were ſworne, as I finde them recorded by themſelues in theſe very words:

The audacious dealings of the Rebels.

To the Commyns of Hawkeſide Pariſh, Bayliffes, or Conſtables, with all the Hamlets of the ſame.

Welbeloued we greet you wel, and whereas our brother Pouerty, and our brother Rogers, goith forward, is openly for the aid and aſſiſtance of your faith, and holy Church, and for the reformation of ſuch Abbeys and Monaſteries, now diſſolued and ſubpreſſed without any juſt cauſe. Wherefore gudde brethers, Foraſmuch as our ſaid brederyn hath ſend to vs for aide and helpe, we doe not onely effectually deſire you, but alſo vnder the paine of deadly ſinne, we command you and euery of you, to bee at the ſtoke Greene beſide Hawkeſide-Kirke, the Saturday next, being the xxviij. day of October by xj. of the clokke, in your beſt array: as you will make anſwer before the heigh Iudge at the dreadfull day of Dome, and in the paine of pulling downe your Houſes, and leaſing of your gudds, and your bodies to be at the Capteynes will: For at the place aforeſaid, then and there, yee and we ſhall take further direction concerning our faith, ſo farre decayed, And for good and laudable Cuſtomes of the Country, And ſuch naughty inuentions and ſtrange Articles now accepted and admitted, ſo that our ſaid brother be ſubdued, they are like to goe furthwards to vtter vndoing of the Commyn-welth.

Slanderous vntruths againſt the King.

(97) And the more to draw forward the rude multitude, which were forward enough of themſelues, they ſet forth in writing theſe ſlanderous vntruths againſt the King.

1 The firſt is, that no Infant ſhall receiue the bleſſed Sacrament of Baptiſme, bott onleſſe an trybett to be payd to the King.

2 The ſecond is, that no man vnder xx^{l}. Lands ſhall eyte no brede made of Wheat, ner Capon, Chekyn, Gois, ner Pigge, bott onleſſe to pay a trybett to the King.

3 The third is, that for euery plogheland the King will haue en trybett, with other diuerſe extreme vrgent cauſes, and hertely fare ye well.

The Oath of the holy Pilgrimes.

The oath of the Pilgrims.

Ye ſhall nat enter into this our Pilgrimage of Grace for the Commyn-welthe, but only for the loue that you doe bere vnto Almighty Godde, his faith, & to holy Churche militant, the maintenance thereof, to the preſeruation of the Kings perſon, his iſſew, to the purifying of Nobilitie, and to expulſe all vilayne blode, and euill Councellers againſt the Commyn-welthe, from his Grace and the priuie Counſel of the ſame, & that ye ſhall ſhall not enter into oure ſaid Pilgramege, for no particular profite to your ſelfe, nor to doe no diſpleaſure to no priuey perſon, but by Councell for the Commyn-welthe, ner ſlee, ner murder for no enuye, but in youre hertts put away all feare and dread, and take afore you the Croſſe of Criſte, and in your herts his faith, the reſtitution of the Churche, the ſubpreſſion of theſe Herytyks, and their opynyons, by all the holle contents of this Booke.

And for the obſeruation of this Oath, heare another command of the Commiſſioners, as we finde it recorded.

To the Bayliffes and Communes of the Towne of Skarboro.

Welbelouyd, we Francys Bygod Knighte, and Iohn Halom yoman, in the name of all the Communes, commande and charde you, that ye aſſemble your ſelues together mediately vpon racepete hereof, and ſo take thys othe wychys wee here ſend vnto yow, and then after in all haſte poſsible to aſsiſt and hayde theis ower brethren, wome we ſende to you to keepe, and make ſure the Caſtell, Towne, and Port of Skarboro, that no man enter into the ſame Caſtel, that balongys vnto Rafe Euers the yonger knyghte, nor any outher whiches did not take full parte with the Communes, at ower firſt and laſt aſſemblynge, in whoys name, aethority, or attorney, ſoeuer they cume, vnleſſe they haue licence of all the Communes, in like manner, ye ſhall truely keepe all ſichys ordinance, and ſhippe to the vſe of the Communes, wythe wyches we charde you at our late being here, and thys not to faile, vpon paine of yower lyues, ye ſhall refer credence vnto this meſſyngeres, thus in haſt: Fare ye well, from Settrynton this Mondaye Sancte Mawris daye.

Francis Bygott Knight, in the name, and by commandement of all the Communes.

The Earle of Shrewesbury maketh againſt the Rebels.

Againſt theſe rout of Rebels George Earle of Shrewsbury muſtred his men, not ſtaying for the Kings Commiſſion, which made him much ſuſpected, hee meant to haue ſided with the Pilgrims himſelfe. To cleare which aſperſions, he made this ſhort (but loyall) Oration vnto his followers, before he entred further into the field.

"How ſoeuer theſe Rebels colour their "pretences for the Weale-publike, and "would draw in others to participate "with them; yet certaine it is, that Trai- "tors they be, and traiterouſly doe pro- "ſecute what they wickedly begun. Fol- "low them who liſt in this lawleſſe en- "terprize; But I for mine owne part "meane not to ſtaine my blood and An- "ceſtors by joyning my meanes with "ſuch a ſort of Raskals, but will rather "liue and die in defence of the Crowne; "yea, if it ſtood but vpon a ſtake. There- "fore thoſe that will take my part in "theſe buſineſſes, let them follow me; "and if any heere amongſt you be other- "wiſe minded, let him depart; but looke "for no more fauour then the Hatchet "and Halter will afford him. And then "in the ſight of them all he cauſed his "Chaplaine to adminiſter him an oath "of his loyaltie vnto the King. It was likewiſe reported that the Earle of Darby was ſet forward towards them, whom the Pilgrims well-hoped would haue ſided with them, as by their Mandate ſent to the Brethren appeares, where is forbid that none of them ſhould aide him, vnleſſe he tooke the Oath: which he neuer meant to aſſay or ſweare to.

Thomas Duke of Norfolke Lord Lieutenant of the North.

(98) But true it is, the King ſent Thomas Duke of Norfolke Lord Generall againſt them, accompanied with the Marqueſſe of Exceſter, the Earles of Huntingdon and Rutland; who joyning their powers, made towards Doncaſter, where the Rebels then lay in their Randiuou; in whoſe ſight immediately they ſet vp their Tents, and determined battell vpon the next day; but on the night betwixt, ſuch flouds of water fell, that the riuer Dunne ouer-flowed his bancke, and admitted no paſſage ouer the Bridge, which thing was taken as a token from God; and thereupon the Lord Generall offered them conference, alledging that the King was tender of his Subjects liues, and very vnwilling to ſhead Chriſtian blood: that their cauſe ſhould be fauourably heard, and juſt complaints redreſſed, if with ſubmiſſion and duty of Subjects, they would yeeld themſelues and affaires to the Kings mercy; that this their rebellious proceedings, was not onely the fore-running meſſenger of deſtruction to themſelues and partakers, but gaue alſo a great aduantage vnto the Scots, the dangerous enemy vnto the Land, and them all: with theſe and the like perſwaſions the matter was ſo forwarded, that a conference was appointed at Doncaſter, and foure pledges were ſent from Pardon and peace offered to the Rebels.

Whose Articles and demands were these, as followeth:

The instruction for Sir Thomas Hylton, and other Companions.

The demands of the Commons.

1 First, to declare to the Duke of Norfolke, and other the Lordys, that th' entent of our meeting of our partie, surely is meant and thought of assured troth, without any manner of disceyte, or male engyne.

2 The second is, to receiue the Kings sauecundyth vnder the Brode Seale of Englonde, and to deliuer our sauecundyth, and promise, vndre owre hands, for the Lordys there.

3. The thirde, to entreate of owre generall perdon for all causys, and all persons, which be within the Realme, wyche in herte, word, or deed assentyd, edyter procured, the furtherance in this our quarrell, may be pardoned life, lands, goods; and that in the said perdon, nor other the Kings records, we be not witon reputed, ne taken, as Rebylleous or tretors, nor rehersyd in the same.

4 The fourth, that Thomas Cromwell, nor any of his bande or serte, be not at owre metyng at Doncastre, but abcente themselfe from the Councell.

5 The fift, to receiue the Kings answere by the declarations of the Lords, and to certifie the vere etent thereof to vs there.

Also, to know what authoritie the Lords haue to etreate, in promes with vs ther, as well of owre promes of other things.

Also, to know what plege the will deliuer for our Capitans.

Also, yf thys pertyculars be concluded, then for to condyscend of other perticulars.

The whole drift was to downe with the Gospell.

1 The first touching our faith, to haue the heresyes of Luther, Wyclyf, Hussee, Melancton, Ecolampadius, Busyrs, the Confession Germane, the Applege of Melanqton, the werke of Tyndale, of Eernys, Fryth, of Marshall, Rastell, the Bookes of Sent Germane, and such other of any manner Heresie, without the Realme, not to be kept, but vtterly to bee dystryed.

2 The secund, to haue the supreme of the Chyrch toching cure of sowlle to be reseruyd to the See of Rome, as byfore hyt whas accustomyd for to be; and to haue the consecration of Byshoppys frome him without any first fruts, or pencyons to him to bee payde out of this Realme, or ellys a pencion reasonable for the outwarde defence of our fayth.

Also, we beseke humble our most drade Soueraigne Lord, that the Lady Mary may be legetymate, and the estatutes contrary to the same to be anulyd for the dome of the tytle that might incur to the Crowne, by Scotland, and that to be by Parliament.

Also, to haue the Abbeys that be suppressed to be restoryd to their Lands, Howsys, and Goods.

Also, to haue the Tents and first fruts clearely dischargyd, onles the Clergy wyll of their selfys grant a Rent or Charge to the augmentation of the Crowne.

Also, to haue the Freres obseruans restoryd to their houses againe.

An vncharitatable and vnchristian motion.

Also, to haue the Heretiks Bishoppys, and temporall men of their seete, to haue condigne ponysment by fire, or such other; or ells to trie ther quarrell with vs and our partakers in battell.

Also, to haue the Lord Crumwell, the Lord Chanceller, and Sir Ryc. Rych Knight to haue condigne ponysment, as subuerters of the gud lawes of the Realme; and onetemers of the slese sect of this false heretykes fyrst inuenter and brengers of them.

Also, that the Landys in Westmorland, Comberland, Kendale, Dentsyd, Furnes, & the Abbeis lands in Yorke, Worsaidyshire, Kerbyshire, Neuerdale, mayne be Tenant Right, and the lord to haue at euery change two yeres rent, in the name of a agar summe, and no more, according to a grant now made by the Lords to the Commens vnder their seales; ſeales; and this to be done by Act of Parlement.

Alſo, the hand-gunnys and Croſſe-boys, with the penaltie of the ſame to be repelled, onles hyt be in the Kings Forreſts and Parkes to Kyllers of Deere.

Alſo, that Doctor Lee, and Doctor Leyton, may haue condigne ponyſhment for their extortions in time of viſitation, in brybes, of ſome religyous houſes, x. l. xx. l. and for other ſummes, beſyde horſys, vowſens, leaſes, vnder couent ſeallys, by them taken, and other abominable acts by them committed and done.

Alſo, to ſee reformation for the election of Knights of Shire, and the Burgys, and for the vſe among the Lords in the Parlament after the ancient cuſtome.

Alſo, the Statute for incloſing Intackes to be put in execution, that all Intacks, Incloſys ſyth Anno quarto Henrici ſeptimi be pullyd downe exceding, Foreſts, and Parkys to be dyſturd of their qũition, and tax now granted by Parlament.

Alſo, to haue the Parlyament in a conuenient place as Nottingham or Yorke, and the ſame to be ſo moued ſhortly.

Alſo, that it may be enacted by authority of Parliament, that all Recogniſans, Statutys, Penaltyes newly forfeyted during the tyme of the Commiſsion may bee pardoned and diſcharged, aſwell againſt the King as Stranger.

Alſo, the priuilege of the Ryght of the Church to be confirmed by Act of Parlament, and Pryſts not to ſuffer onles they be degraded; a man to be ſaued by his Booke; Sanctuary to ſaue a man in all cauſes in extreme need, and the Church to ſaue a man for forty daies; and further according to the Lawes as they were vſed in the beginning of the Kyngys dayes.

Alſo, the libertyes of the Church, to haue their old cuſtoms, as the County-Palatine of Durham, Beuerley, Reppon, S. Peter of Yorke, and ſuch other by Act of Parliament.

Alſo, to haue the Statute that no man ſhall declare his will on his land to bee repelled.

Alſo, the Statute of treaſon for Wurdys, made ſith Anno xxj. of our Soueraign that now is, to be in like wiſe repelled.

Alſo, that the Common Law may haue place aſwell as was vſed in the beginning of your gracious Raigne, and that all Injunctions be clearely denied, and not granted, vnleſſe the matter be heard in the Chancery, and there determined.

Alſo, that no man vpon ſub pœna, or Priuy Seale from Trent Northward, appeare but at Yourke, or by Atturney, vnleſſe it be directed vpon pene of Allegyance, or for like matter concerning the King.

Alſo, a remedy againſt Exchequer for fining of falſe Offices, and extortions in taking of Fees, for that which is not held of the King, and againſt the promoters thereof.

Theſe were the inſtructions giuen to their Commiſſioners to bee conferred vpon; all which as it ſhould ſeeme, were drawne into foure Articles or Heads, as by the minute of the Kings anſwer thereunto doth appeare. Which originall wholly penned by King Henries owne hand, I haue here inſerted word for word, to ſhew his learned care both for Church and Common-wealth: the originall it ſelfe remaineth in the Liberary of the worthy Sir Robert Cotton Knight Baneret, the ſtorer of all learned Antiquities.

Anſware to the demands off the Rebellys in Yorkeſhyre. 28. Hen. 8. December.

First, as touching the mayntenance off the fayth, the termys be ſoo general that hard they be to be anſward. But iff they meane the fayth off Chryſt, to which all Chryſten men be moſt oblygyd, we declare and proteſt our ſelfe to be he that always do, and haue myndyd to dy and lyue in the puryte off the ſame, and declare that no man can or dare ſett hys fote by ours in prouyng off the contrary: maruelyng not a lytyll that Ignorant pepole will goo abowght, or take vpon them to inſtructe vs (which ſume thyng haue bene noted to bee lerned) what the ryght fayth ſhold be. Or that they wold be ſo ingrate and vnnaturall to vs theyre moſt ryghtfull King, withowght any our deſart, vpon falſe reports & ſurmyſys to ſuſſpecte vs off the ſame, and gyffe rather credence to forgyd light talys, then to the approued traght by vs thys xxviij. yers vſyd, and by oure deds approued. The firſt Article.

To the ſeconde, which tochythe the mayntenance off the Chyrche, and lybertes off the ſame, thys is ſo genera aproposycion that withowgt diſtinctions no man with trawght can anſware it nother. For firſt, the Chyrche which they mene muſt be knowne. Secondly, whether they lawfull or vnlawfull lybertes whych they require, I mene bothe by Gods Lawes, and Lawes of the Realme. The ſecond Article.

And

And thes know I dowght not but they ſhall be anſwarde, according to Gods Law, equite and Iuſtice. The thyrde tochyth three things, the laws, the Commune-welthe, the directors off the lawes vnder vs. Tochyng the laws, we expreſly dare teſtyfy that blind men denying no colers, nor yet being Iudggs, it ſhall be duly prouy that there were neuer in any of our prediſſeſſours dayes ſo many holſume commodius and benyffyciall Acts made for the Commenwelthe, and yet I mene it ſyns theyre tyme that wolde fayne haue thanke withowght deſert. For our Lord forbedde (ſeyng we haue bene this xxviij. yere your King) that both we and our Counſell ſhuld haue loſt ſo much tyme, as not to know now better then when we came firſt to our rayne, what were the Commenwelthe, and what the ſelfe-conceit were not, & thought the owther-quedance of ſume may chance will nott lett them to knowledge it ſo; yet I truſt and dowght nott but the moſt part of our louyng Subiects (ſpecially thos which be not ſeducyd by falſe report, do bothe thynke it, accept it, and fynde it ſo.) Now tochyng to the Commune-welthe, what King hath keptt yow all hys ſubiects ſo longe, in welthe & peace ſo longe, withowght takyng or doyng wrong, whon to the other ſo indifferently mynyſter iuſtice to all bothe hye and low; So defendyd you all frome owghtward enymyſe; ſo fortyfyed the fronters off the Realme, to his no lityll and in a maner ineſtimable cargs, and all for your welthes and ſurtes. What king hath gyffen among you mo generall or frear pardons. What Kyng hath be lother to punyſh his Subiects, or ſhewde more marcy amoſt them? Theſe thyngs beyng ſo trew, as no trew man can deny them, it is an vnnaturall and vnkynd demenour off you our Subiects, to beleue or deme the contrary off it, by hous report ſoo euer it ſhuld be. As tochyng the begynnyng of our Rayne, wher ye ſay, ſo meny Nobyll men were Counſelers, hoo were then Counſelers I well remember, and yet off the Temporalte I notte non but two wordy callyng Nobyll, the won Treſourer of Yngland, and the other hye Stuvard off our others, as the * Lord Marney and Darcy, but ſars wel-borne Gentyllmen, and yet of no grett lands, till they were promotyd by me, and ſoo made knyghts and Lords, the reſt wer Lawyers and Preſtes, ſaue two Biſhopys, whyche wer Cantorbyry and Wyncheſter. Yff theſe then be the grett Nobyllmen ye ſpecke off, and ye ſemed then to be content withall, why then nowe be ye nott much better content with vs, whyche haue now ſo meny Nobylls in dedd, bothe of byrth and condyſſion. For firſt off the Temporalyte in our preve Conſell, we haue the Duke of Norfolke, the Duke of Suffolk, the Markes off Exceter, the Lorde Stuward (when he may come) the Erle off Oxford, the Erle off Suſſex, the Lord Sandes our Chamberlayn, the Lord Admyrall Treſourer off our Houſe; Sir Wyllyam Paulet Controler off our Houſe: And off ſpirituall the B. off Herefford, Chycheſter, and Wyncheſter. Now, loke how fare ye be abuſed to recõne that then there wer mo Nobyll men in our preuy Conſel, than now. But yet though I nowe do declare the truthe, to pull yow fro the blyndenes that you wer leddin, yet we enſure we wolde ye knoo, that it appartayneth nothyng to any off oure ſubiects to poynte vs our Conſell, ne wee wolde take it ſoo at your hands. Wherefore henſefourth remember better the dutys off Subiects to your King and Souerayne, and meddle not off that whyche ye haue nothyng to do in. And in caſe it be but a falſe and vntrue report (as we verely thynke it is) then it were as mette and ſtandyth as well with iuſtice, that they ſhulde haue the ſelfeſame puniſment whyche wrongfully hath obiectyd thys to them that they ſhulde haue had, if they deſeruyd it. And won thyng amonſt others makyth mee thynke that thys ſlander ſhulde be vntrw, by cauſe it procedyth frome that plaſe whych is both ſo ferre diſtant frome wher they inhabite, and alſo frome thos peple whyche neuer hard them preche, nor yet knowght any part off theyre conuerſation: Werfore we exorte ye our Commons to be no more ſo lyght off gredit, nother off ill thyngs ſpoken off your Kyng and Souerayne, nor yet off any off his Prelats or Conſellers; but to thynke that your Kyng hauing ſoo long raynyd ouer you, hath as good diſcreſſion to electe and cheuſe his Conſellers, as thes hoo euer they be that hath put thys in your hedds.

Here in this fynall poynt whyche ye our Commons off Yorkſhire do deſyre it, and alſo in the mator off the hole we verely thynke, that the reſt off our holle Commones (wheroff ye be in maner but an handfull) wyll grettly disdayne, and nott bere that ye take vppon ye, to set order bothe to them and vs your bothe Souerayne, and that (thowght ye be rebelles) you wolde make them as berers and part takers off your myscheffe, wyllyng them to take pardon for insurrection, whyche verely I thynke, & dowght nott they neuer mynded, but like trew subjects to the contrary, hath bothe with hart and dede bene redy att our call to defende bothe vs & themselfe. And now for our part, as to your demandes, we let you wytt, that pardon of such thyngs as ye demande liett wonly in the wyl and pleasure off the Prince: But it semyth by your leaude Proclamations & saue condutes, that there be amongst you who take vpon them bothe the Kings and Consellers parts, whyche nother yet by vs, nor by consent off the Realme, hath bene admytted to any suche rome. What arroganfy then is in thos wretches (being also off none experiens) to presume to rayse ye our subiects with owght Commission or auctoryte, ye, and agaynst vs, vnder a clokyd colur off your wellthe, and in our name: And as the succes wyll declare (we benyng no more mersifull then ye hytherto do desarue) to yours other confusions. Wherfore we lett you wytt, ye our subiects off Yorkeshyre, that were it not that our pryncely hart can nott recõne thys your shamfull Insurrection and vnnaturall rebellyon to be done off malice, or rancore, but rather by a lyghtnes gyffen in a maner by a naghty nature to a Communalte, and a wonderus sodeyne surreption off Gentyllmen, we must nedes haue excecuted another maner of punishement then (ye humbelyng knowlegyng your faults, and submyttyng your selfes to our marcy) we intend to doo. And to the intente that ye shal all know, that our Pryncely hart rather inbraseth (off his awne disposicion) pite and compassion off his offending subiects, then wyll to be reuenged off theyre naghte deddes, we are contented, yff we may see and parsayue in you all a sorofulnes for your offensys, and will hensforth to do nere soo, nor to beleue soo leaude and nawghty tales or reports off your most kynd and louyng Prynce, and hys Consell, to grant vnto you all our Letter Pattens off pardon for this rebellion; so that ye will deliuer vnto vs shuche off the ryng-leders and prouokers off you to thys rebellion, as we shall assyne to yow and poynt. Now note the benyngnyte off your Prince. Now note how easely ye maye haue pardone bothe Gentyllmen, and other, yff ye list. Now note, how effusion off blude may be exchuyd. Now note what thys lytyll wyle off your rebellyon hath hynderyd your selfes and Contre. Now lerne by a lytyll lake to exchew a worse. Now lerne by thys smalle warnyng to kepe yow trw men. Thus I as your hed, praye for you my members, that God may light yow with hys grace to knowlege, and declare your selfes our trw subiects hensforth, and to gyff more credence to thes our benyng parswasions, then to the paruarse instigations off malicius disposed parsons.

Fynys.

The effect that the KINGS Reply wrought, is manifest by his free pardons sent vnto the offenders, by Proclamation divulged by his Messenger at Armes and his Trumpet thorowout the North parts, the tenour whereof from the Originall is, as followeth.

King Henries free pardon by Proclamation.

All bee yt, that yowe the Kings Subiects and Commons dwelling and inhabiting in the Shires of Yorke, Cumberland, Westmerland, Northumberland, the Bishopricke of Durham, the Citty of Yorke, and the Shire of the same, the Towne of Kyngston vpon Hull, and the Shire of the same, the Towne of Newcastle vpon Tyne, and the Shire of the same, and in other Shires, Townes, Dalis, Places priuiledged, the Fraunchises and Liberties within the limits of the said shires, Citties, and Townes, or any of them, or being reputed or taken for any part, parcell or number of any of them, and such other the Kings said Subiects, inhabited in the Towne of Lancaster, or elswhere by North, in the Shire of Lancaster, haue now of late attempted and committed manifest and open rebellon, against his most royall Magesty, whereby was like to haue ensewde the vtter reiwin and distruction of thes hole Cuntreis, to the grete comforte and auancement of your awncient enemies the Scots, which as his Hienes is credably enformed, doe with a great Redines wache vpon the same, and to the high displeasure of God, who streitely commandeth you to obay your Soueraign Lord and King, in all things, and not with violence to resist his will or Commandement, for any cause whatsoeuer it be: Neuertheless the Kings roiall Magesty, perceiuing as well by the Articles of their part-

fers ſent to his Hyenes: As alſo dewly enormed by credible reports, that their ſaid offences proceeded of ignorance, and by occaſion of ſundrie falſe talis, neuer minded or entended by his Hienes, or any of his Councell, but moſt craftely contriued, and moſt ſpitefully ſet abroade amongs you, by certaine malicious and ſeditious perſons; and thereupon his Hyghnes inclined to extend his moſt gracious mercy and pitty towards you, hauing chefe charge of you vnder God, both of your ſowles and bodies, and deſiring rather the preſeruation of the ſame, and your reconciliation, by his mercifull meyns, than by the order and rigour of Iuſtice to puniſh you according to your demeryts, of his ineſtimable goodneſſe, benignity, mercy, and pety, and at your moſt humble petitions and ſubmiſsions made vnto his Highneſſe, he is content and plaiſed to gife and grant, and by his preſent Proclamation doth gyfe and grant vnto you all, and to all and euerie your confederates whereſoeuer they dwell, of eſtate, degree, or what condition ſoeuer you or they be, or by what name or names ſoeuer they or you be, or may be called, his Generall and free pardon for all manner of treaſons, rebellions, inſurrections, miſpriſions of treaſons, murders, robberies, felons, and of all acceſſaries of the ſame, and of euery of them, vnlawfull aſſembles, vnlawfull Conuenticles, vnlawfull ſpeaking of words, confederacies, riots, rowts: And all other treſpaſſes, offencies and contempts, done and committed by you, or anie of you againſt the Kings Mageſtie, his Crowne or dignity roiall, within and from the time of the beginning of the ſaide Rebellion whenſoeuer it was, vnto the preſent day of proclaiming of this Proclamation, and of all paines, iudgements, and executions of death, and all other penalties, forfeitures, fynes, and forfeitures of Landes, Tenements, Hereditaments, Goods or Cattels, by any of your forfeitures incurred by reaſon of the premiſes, or any of them; which Fines, Forfeitures, Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, Goods and Cattels, the Kings ſaid Highnes of his ſpeciall grace, and mere motion by theſe preſents, giueth to ſuch of you, as haue or ſhould haue forfeited, or loſte the ſame, by occaſion of the premiſſes, or any of them: And alſo his Highnes is pleaſed, and contented, that you, and euery of you, from time to time ſhall and may haue apon your ſewtes to be made hereafter in his Chauncery, his ſaid and moſt gracious and free pardon vnder his great Seale concerning the premiſſes, without any further Bill or Warrant to be obtained for the ſame, and without paying any thing for the great Seale thereof: And that you, and euery of you, from time to time, may freely & liberally ſewe for his ſaid pardon, when and as often as it ſhall like you, without any trouble, vexation or impeachment for the premiſſes, or any of them, by his heires, or by any his Officiaries, Miniſters, or Subjects, by any manner of meanes or in anie manner of wiſe. Prouided alwaies, that you and euerie of you in token of a perfect declaration and knowledge, that ye doe hartilie lament and be ſorrie for your ſaid offences, ſhall make your humbly ſubmiſsion vnto his Highnes, in the preſence of his right truſtie and right intirely beloued Coſens and Concellairs: the Duke of Norfolke, and the Earle of Shrewsburie his Lieutenants Generall, or any of them, or to their Deputy or Deputies of them, or any of them, or ſuch other perſon, or perſons as the Kings Highnes ſhall appoint for the ſame: Furthermore, the Kings moſt roiall Mageſty, ſtreitely chargeth and commandeth, that you, & euery of you, ſhal from henceforth, like trew and faithfull Subjects vſe your ſelues, in Gods peace, and his, according to the duties of allegeance, & that you ſhall in no wiſe hereafter, attempt to make or procure, any ſuch rebellion, intent, vnlawfull Aſſemblies, Riots, Rowts, and Conſpirations, nor at the Commandement, nor by the Authority of any perſon, of what eſtate or degree, or for what cauſe ſoeuer it be, ſhall ariſe in any forcible manner, and array, vnleſſe it be at the ſpeciall commandement of the kings Highnes, or his Lieutenant, ſufficiently auctoriſed for the ſame. In witnes whereof the Kings moſt royall Mageſty, hath cauſed this his Proclamation to be made Patent, and ſealed with his great ſayle at Richemounte the IX. day of December in the XXVIII. yeare of his Reigne. 1536.

Notwithſtanding this Generall pardon and mercifull dealings of the King, a new Inſurrection was raiſed in the North, wherein many of the former were now againe Actors, as by name Robert Aske, whom the King had not onely pardoned, but alſo highly rewarded, the Lord Dacres, S^r. Robert Conſtable, S^r. Francis Bygod, Pulmer, Percy, Hamilton, Tempeſt, and Lumley, all of them put to death, as they well deſerued. Hollinſh. pag. 944.

and with them were taken as Traitors againſt the Crowne: for which offence many of them ſuffered death: namely, Iohn Paſlaw Abbot of Whaley in Lincolnſhire, Iohn Caſtegate, and William Haydocke Monkes of the ſame houſe, Robert Hobs Abbot of Woborne in Bedfordſhire, Adam Sudbury Abbot of Geruaux, with Aſtbeed a Monke of that houſe, the Abbot of Sawley in Lancaſhire, and the Prior of the ſame place, William Wold Prior of Birlington, the Parſon of Pudington, fiue Prieſts of Lincolnſhire, and with them their Chiefetaine, Captaine Cobler, and Iohn Allen Prieſt.

Monkes hanged for rebellion.

(100) Theſe ſtirres thus quieted, and the Stateſmen at leaſure to preuent the like, a Commiſſion came forth to purge the Churches of Idols; and to ſuppreſſe the Monaſteries, to the Kings vſe, granted vnto him by Parliament: the one of them the onely working cauſe, through the gaine that was got by ignorant deuotion, and gadding on pilgrimage, and the other, the Neſt and very receptacle of all traitrous attempters, againſt the peace of the Land, & Supremacy of the Crowne. The abuſe of the firſt was ſolemnly ſhewed at Pauls Croſſe in London, vpon Sunday the twentie foure of February, by Doctor Iohn Fiſher Biſhop of Rocheſter, where the Roode of Boxley in Kent, commonly called The Roode of Grace (made with diuers vices to bow downe, and to lift vp it ſelfe, to ſhake, and to ſtir both head, hands, and feet, to rowle the eyes, mooue the lips, and to bend the browes,) was then broken and pulled in pieces. So likewiſe the Images of our Lady of Walſingham and Ipſwich, ſet and beſprinkled with Iewels, and Gemmes, with diuers others both of England and Wales, were brought to London, and burnt at Chelſey before the Lord Crumwell. Then the Axes of the hewers began to caſt downe the walles of all Monaſteries, whoſe number (as Cambden doth account them) were ſixe hundred forty fiue, beſides foure-ſcore and tenne Colledges, them of Oxford and Cambridge not accounted: Of Hoſpitals one hundred and ten, and of Chaunteries and free Chappels two thouſand three hundred ſeuenty foure, all of the almoſt were then borne downe with the ſudden deluge of thoſe tempeſtuous times, whilſt the world ſtood amazed, King Henry proceeded, & the Clergy-men groaned vnder their owne deſtructions: Among theſe the Shrine of Thomas Becket was

(101) The yerely reuenewes of theſe, as they were valued by the Cõmiſſioners, at their ſubuerſions, amounted to an vneſtimable ſumme, as appeareth by the Originall Booke it ſelfe, preſented to the King, whereof more ſhall be ſpoken in the end of this Chapter, and yet moſt of them rated at Robin-hoods pennyworths, what their rents were, a libell ſcattered abroad, & read to the King, by demonſtration did prooue, wherein was accounted, that vnto the fiue Orders of Friers, (euery houſholder paying them fiue pence the Quarter) the ſumme of fortie three thouſand, three hundred thirtie three pound, ſixe ſhillings and eight pence ſterling, was paid them by yeere, beſides the reuenewes of their owne lands, which was not a little; ſo that not without cauſe many entred into a Monaſticall life, rather to liue at full, & without cares of this world, then to feed the flocke of Chriſt, or to win them, and not theirs, after the example of the Apoſtle. ſeuen Seales, and their mouthes vnmuzled they did deuoure, but not tread out the corne, ſo that the Sunne by their doctrine ſeemed to be darkened, as with ſmoake, and themſelues to be the Locuſts that ouer-ſpred the ſuperficies of the Earth, whoſe faces were like men, pretending humanity, their haire like women in ſhew of modeſty, their Crownes of counterfeited gold, ſignifying their vſurped authoritie, their teeth like Lyons ſhewing their Tyranny, their force like Horſes prepared for battell, their habergions of Iron betokening their ſtrength, the ſound of their wings, the thundering out their mandates like to the rumbling of Chariots in warre, their Tailes (the falſe prophets) hauing ſtings like vnto Scorpions, and their King the bad Abaddon, euen the Angell of the Bottomles pit. All thoſe alluſions moſt aptly fitting theſe Cloyſtered Friers, who now growne to the height of their ſinnes, their skirts were diſcouered, that their ſhame might appeare; being the onely men then laid open to the world. For, beſides the idle ignorance and voluptuous exceſſe of theſe cloyſtered Votaries, their monaſticall ſenſualities afforded a ſhamefull diſcouery of wicked adulteries and filthy Sodomites: whoſe ſinnes, as they then ſtained the world, to their Cells ouer-throw, ſo let their remembrance ſtaine that religion which debars the bed of lawfull marriage, and diſpenſeth with ſuch crying and too monſtrous ſins. A Catalogue of whoſe names (if the inke ſtaine not the Paper wherein they ſtand) ſhall ſtand a Record of their filthy ſhame, as long as inke is to be read vpon Paper. Take them then from his teſtimony that tooke them out of an Engliſh Booke, containing an Inuentory (or Catalogue) of the villanies diſcouered in the Viſitations of Monaſteries, Couents, Collegiate Churches, and other religious Houſes in England, by command of King Henry the eighth; wherein the whooredomes, adulteries, inceſts, and filthy Sodomites of the Monkes, Friers, and Prieſts, both names and ſurnames are written, as followeth:

In Saint Auguſtine, — Thomas Barham a whore-monger and a Sodomite.

In Chicheſter, — John Champion, Roger Barham, both of them vnnaturall Sodomites.

In Cathedrall Church, — John Hill had no leſſe then 13. whores.

In Windſore Caſtle, — Nicholas Whyden had 4., George Whitethorn kept 5., Nicholas Spoter kept 5., Robert Hunne had 5., Robert Danyſon kept 6. — whores.

In Shulbred Monaſtery. — George Walden Prior of Shulbred had 7., John Standney had at his command 7., Nicholas Duke to ſupply his venery had 5 — whores.

In Bermondſey Abbey. — John White Prior, or rather Bull of Bermondſey had twenty whores.

But ſaith mine Author, the Catalogue of ſuch whore-maſters, and adulterers, is too long to record: for thoſe Cloyſtred Monkes and Friers, from 600. Couents (almoſt) ſcrawling about the land by auricular ricular confeſſion, got into the boſomes of ſimple ſinning women, and deflowred the beds of many better men. And the wanton Nunnes likewiſe dallying with them in the darke, brought forth the fruits of darkneſſe, as was found in finding many Infants bones in many of their Cells: Whoſe wickedneſſe (as the Ammonites) being now full, the maule of Gods juſtice beat downe the walls of their ſhelters, and the ſword of his wrath ſo cut the cords of their ſtrength aſunder, as that Idoll of Rome hath had his crowne cruſhed, and his authority ſhortned in all the Chriſtian world euer ſince.

(102) Againſt theſe and their doctrine in former times (beſides many others in other forraine parts) two in the daies of King Henry the fourth, the firſt Engliſh King that put any to death for the doctrine of Rome; (omitting Sir Iohn Oldcaſtle and others, that died for the Goſpels defence, in the daies of King Henry the fifth) foure in the raigne of innocent Henry the ſixth. One in the daies of King Edward the fourth; and ten in the time of King Henry the ſeuenth, ſealed the doctrine againſt the Papall religion with their blood; all of them being martyred, before that Martin Luther wrote. And in the raigne of this King 26. ſuffered the fire, before the flames thereof could bee quenched, which a while was done by the meanes of good Queene Anne, till afterwards they mounted higher, when the ſixe Articles were made: but becauſe this Eccleſiaſticke text is handled elſe-where, and ſeemeth vnſociable to our begun Subject, we will referre the Reader for theſe matters vnto the induſtrious paines of that worthy and euer-venerable man Mr. Foxe, taken in his Acts and Monuments of Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtory.

(103) The Monaſteries thus diſſolued, and the reuenewes thereof conuerted to temporall vſes, K. Henry ran in great obloquie of many forrain Potentates, but moſt eſpecially of the Pope; who with Cardi. Poole inſtigated diuers Princes in Chriſtendome to inuade England, thus falne from his faith: Yea, and home-borne Subjects diſliking the courſe for Papiſticall ſubuerſion, by ſecret working ſought to depriue King Henry, and to raiſe vp Reynold Poole vnto the Regall dignity, as by their inditements appeareth. The perſons conuicted, were Lord Henry Courtney Marqueſſe of Exceſter, & Earle of Deuonſhire, the ſon of Lady Katherine, the ſeuenth daughter of King Edward the fourth. Henry Poole Lord Montacute, with Sr. Geffrey his brother, and Sr. Edward Neuill brother to the L. of Abergauenny. Theſe Pooles were the ſonnes of Lady Margaret Counteſſe of Salisbury, the onely daughter of George D. of Clarence: & of theſe, Reinold Poole once Deane of Exceſter, & now Cardinal at Rome, was accounted the onely man.

(104) And this foreſaid Lord Marqueſſe had formerly been in ſuch fauour with K. Henry, that at his going into France he ordained him his heire-apparant, though at his returne, vpon graue deliberation, he ſaw it better policy to plucke him downe, then was vſed in ſetting him vp, leſt in acting his part vpon that infectiue ſtage, he put the land to as much trouble as the arreared Duke Richard of Yorke had done, after he was ordained heire-apparant, which Title produced the Tragedy of his raiſer King Henry the ſixth, and now hauing him and his Abettors vpon the aduantage, the better to ſecure his owne Eſtate, he cauſed the heads of this Lord Marqueſſe, with the Lord Montacute, and Sr. Edward Neuill to be cut off vpon Tower-hill.

(105) The King then a Widdower, ſince the death of Q. Iane, who departed this life two yeeres before, meant to maintaine what he had done, maugre all oppoſites: which the better to effect, by the Councell of Lord Cromwell, hee ſought and obtained the alliance of the Princes of Germany, and heard the motion for marriage with the Lady Anne, ſiſter to William Duke of Cleue, whoſe other ſiſter Fredericke D. of Saxony had eſpouſed, a great fauourer of the Goſpel, and maintainer of Martin Luther the zealous Preacher and profeſſor thereof. But whether Frederick for the death of Anne Bullen, or that he would haue his wiues ſiſter beſtowed neerer at home (which thing he pretended) a great hinderer hee was of that match. But the Lady ſent into England, and married vnto K. Henry, ſeemed nothing pleaſing in his eye; which Stephen Gardiner then Biſhop of Winchester perceiuing, thought it a fit ſubject for him to worke vpon, againſt the L. Cromwell the maker of the match; he therefore inſtigated iealouſies daily into the Kings eare; firſt exaſperating the hatred of the Princes of Grmany to himwards, and eſpecially of D. Fredericke his compulſiue brother in Law, the Emperour, French King, the Scots, and the Pope,

Of Anne we haue ſeene what hath beene ſaid, and of this Queen let vs heare what ſhe proteſted after her condemnation, to Doctor White Biſhop of Wincheſter, her laſt Confeſſor, and by him deliuered to a Noble young Lord of her name, and neere alliance: Her words were theſe: As to the Act, my reuerend Lord, for which I ſtand condemned; God and his holy Angels I take to witneſſe vpon my ſoules ſaluation, that I die guiltleſſe, neuer hauing ſo abuſed my Soueraignes bed: what other ſins and follies of youth I haue committed, I will not excuſe; but am aſſured that for them God hath brought this puniſhment vpon me, and will in his mercy remit them, for which I pray you, pray with me, vnto his Sonne, and my Sauiour Chriſt.

Rom. 1. 26.

This young Heifer (ſaith hee) abiding no yoake, a coy dame, and of very euill fame, left the company of Maſter Kyme, to gad vp and downe a Goſſpelling and Goſſipping where ſhe might, and ought not, but eſpecially in London, and neere the Court, now ſhee being faire and but twenty fiue yeeres old at her death, doth eaſily ſhew what may may be ſuſpected of her life, and the myſticall ſpeeches and demands of the Kings Councel touching her departure from her husband, were grounded vpon ſomewhat, eſpecially in that ſhee called her ſelfe Anne Askew, alias Kyme. Thus far this ſcandalizing man hath accuſed this holy Anne, by the outward appearance of her youth and beauty: as holy Anna, by Eli, was accuſed of drunkennes, when her heart was moſt feruent in ſupplications to her God; and his partiall pen, made the Fan to ſift the Wheat of her holy conuerſation to finde out ſome Chaffe, whereof none is free, nor is ſhe to be condemned vpon the imagerie of his ſuſpicious head (who vndoubtedly would haue told all, if any thing could haue beene found) whereas ſhe in the vigour of beauty and weakneſſe of her Sexe, reſiſted the gainesayers of the truth with her deareſt bloud: teſtifying from the Priſons her faith and conſtancy, & from the Rack preached Chriſt, whereon moſt vnhumanely and againſt kinde, ſhe was twice tormented; and laſtly, ſealed her teſtimony in Smithfield, through the flames of fire: being borne to the place of her death in a Chaire, her bones ſo diſioynted by the Racke that ſhe could not goe.

(113) The irreuerend * N. D. whoſe affection to Chriſts Goſpel & loyalty to the Engliſh Crown hath ſufficiently ſhewed it ſelfe, to make her no Martyr, and that her life did demerit the Rack, ſaith, that the King himſelfe commanded that torture to be inflicted, for infecting with her erroneous doctrine, his Court, his Neeces, Suffolks daughters, & his Queen. Wheras the truth tels vs, that the Lieutenant refuſing to rack her the ſecõd time, was threatned by Wriotheſley Lord Chancellor (who did it himſelf) to be complained of to the King, who immediately tooke Boat, & told the whole Tragedy; wherof K. Henry ſeemed to be ſore offended, for vſing a Woman with ſuch inhumane tortures. But ſuch fauours had the Popes Chickens vnder the ſhroud of the Church, and wing of this Monarch, that they feared not to follow the appeale of death, euen vpon her that ſlept in his own boſome, which was Queene Katherine Parre, eſpouſed vnto him ſome 3. yeeres before, & whom (as this States intelligencer doth confeſſe) he meant to haue burned, had he longer liued. For the truth is (ſaith hee) that the Kings ſickneſſe and death ſhortly enſuing, was the chiefe cauſe of her eſcape; and the errour of the Lord Chancellor, Wriotheſley, who let fall out of his boſome the Kings hand and Commiſſion for carrying her to the Tower, gaue occaſion (the paper found and brought her) to goe & humble her ſelfe to the King; the principall occaſion againſt her, was Hereticall Bookes, found in her Clozet, both brought and ſent her by Anne Askew, whereof the witneſſes were the Lady Herbert, Lady Iane, Lady Tyrwit, and others. Indeed it is true, that by Gods prouidence ſuch papers were let fall out of the Lord Chancellors boſome, containing certain articles againſt her, with a warrãt to commit her to the Tower, whereunto the Kings hand was ſubſcribed: which being found, was preſently brought to the Queene, whereof the vnexpected content ſo deeply touched her tender heart, that forthwith ſhe fell into great feares, laments, and a moſt heauy melancholy, and was in ſuch danger of death, that the King came to viſit her, hauing not gone forth of his Chamber of many daies before; whereat ſhe ſo rejoyced, as ſhe began to amend: and to acknowledge her like loue and duty, the next night following, repayred to the Kings Bed-chamber, accompanied onely with the Lady Herbert her ſiſter, and the Lady Iane the Kings neece, carrying the candle before her, of whoſe preſence the King ſeemed to be moſt deſirous; and preſently falling in talk of religion, began to debate ſome queſtion therof with the Queen, demanding to haue her reſolutions therin; but ſhe knowing that his nature was not to be croſt, and the ſorenes of his legge to encreaſe his choller, made him anſwere, that ſhe was a woman, accompanied with many imperfections, but his Maieſty wiſe and iudicious, of whom ſhe muſt learne, as of her Lord and Head, for ſo God hath appointed you (ſaid ſhe) the Supreme Head of vs all, of whom next vnto him I will euer learne. Not ſo, by Saint Mary, ſaid the King, you are become a Doctor, Kate, to inſtruct vs, and not to be inſtructed by vs, as often heretofore wee haue ſeene. Indeed (ſaid ſhe) if your Maieſty haue ſo conceiued, I haue bin miſtaken in my meaning, who haue euer held it preposterous for a woman to inſtruct her Lord. And whereas I haue heretofore held talke with your Highneſſe touching Religion, it was to learne of your Maieſty ſome excellent point which my ſelfe ſtood in doubt of: and ſometimes to the end that you might with leſſe griefe paſſe ouer this painfull time of your infirmity, wherein if by my ouer-much boldneſſe I haue failed in the latter,

The Queene ſeeing the King chafed, but knew not the cauſe, indeauoured by all meanes to pacifie his Majeſtie, and intreated for the Lord Chancellour, whoſe fault as ſhe thought and alledged, was rather through miſimpriſion then will, and therefore, ſaid ſhe, I will become an humble ſuiter for him vnto your Highneſſe. Ah poore Soule (quoth the King) thou little knoweſt Kate, how euill he deſerueth this grace at thy hands: of my word (ſweet heart) hee hath beene towards thee a very knaue. But in following this tract of blood, flowed from the fountaine of the ſixe Articles, we haue ſtepped ouer ſome other occurrences that happened ſomewhat before this time, vnto which with thy patience, good Reader, wee will returne againe.

(114) King Henry by order of Parliament hauing aſſumed the Stile and Title of King of Ireland, with the ſubmiſſion of moſt of the Iriſh Nobility, Iames his Nephew, King of Scotland, tooke it not well, for that, as Liſley ſaith, a great part of Ireland, eſpecially in the North, had beene in poſſeſſion of the Scottiſhmen for many hundred of yeeres before. Theſe diſcontents conceiued, King Henry well perceiued; and becauſe he would haue no ill-will ſo neere him, that had ſo many enuiers abroad, he ſent vnto King Iames that it would pleaſe him to repaire vnto the City of Yorke, where he would meete him, to conferre for the wealth of both the Realmes: vnto which at firſt he granted, but vpon better aduice, vnaccompliſhed, his Councellors mouing the dangers; and his Clergy the feares; leſt their Religion ſhould be changed to the offence of his confederates the Pope, the Emperour, and the French King.

(115) The vnkindneſſe growing from this ſmall ſparke, was preſently kindled into great flames, for Commiſſioners being ſent from both Kings, to view the limits of either Kingdome, they fell at ods about a ſmall piece of ground, and from that tooke occaſion of emulations and warres: to proſecute which, King Henry prepared an Army, and ſent them into Scotland vnder the conduct of the Duke of Norfolke, accompanied with the Earles of Shrewsbury, Darby, Cumberland, Surrey, Hertford, Angus, and Rutland. Theſe, paſſing the Engliſh Marches, did much hurt in the Kingdome of Scotland. To withſtand whom, King Iames gathered a power of fiue and thirty thouſand ſtrong, and at Fallow Moore, meant to haue bidden the Duke battell, which as that Writer related, was not then minded to doe, but made againe into England, and paſſing the water Tweed, ſuſtained great loſſe by the couragious purſuit of the Lord Huntly. King Iames vpon a luſty courage, meaning to repaire the Scots loſſes with the Engliſh ſpoyles, was very forward to follow the Duke into their borders, but the Scottiſh Nobility wiſely waying the danger of war, by no meanes would either aſſent or aſſiſt him out of his owne kingdome, affirming it honour ſufficient, to haue forced the Engliſh backe with no little loſſe.

The Scottiſh Noblemen refuſe to inuade England.

(116) King Iames diſcontented at his Nobles denials, made towards the borders himſelfe, where, mouing the Lord Maxewell, Lord Warden of the Weſt Borders, with many other men of ſpeciall fauour and account, to inuade England, they gaue their conſents. Theſe, paſſing the Riuer Eske, did ſome ſmall dammage vpon the Weſterne Borderers, whereof Thomas Baſtard Dacres, and * Iacke of Muſgraue, as Holinſhead cals them, ſent word to Thomas Wharton, Lord Warden for the King vpon the Weſt-Marches: But the Scots comming forward, they were forced to prepare for fight, before the Lord Wharton could come, and out of their ſmall company left a ſtand vpon the ſide of a hill.

The death of King Iames of Scotland.

(119) Newes brought neere at one inſtant, of the death of King Iames, and birth of the Princeſſe his daughter, King Henry intended to do that by the match of a marriage, which long had beene aſſayed by the Sword of Mars: all things ſo conſorting as it did, he hauing one only ſonne, then aboue fiue yeeres of age, and Scotland no heire beſide this newborne daughter; their yeeres ſuiting a conſent for marriage, the whole Iland offering both the joynter and dowry, and that which moſt moued, their chiefe Nobility in his own hands to be moulded for this deſigne, as if heauen it ſelfe had bid the banes.

A mariage intended betwixt Prince Edward, and the young Queene of Scotland.

(120) Thoſe Priſoners therfore which had remained in the Tower onely two daies, vpon the twenty one of December, he ſent for to Weſtminſter, the Earles and Lords all ſuited in gownes of blacke damaske, furred with Cunny, where, after ſome words of friendly reproof, they were beſtowed among the Engliſh Nobility, who vſed them according to their eſtates: and the third day, in Chriſtmas, were inuited to the Court at Greenwich, where they went before the King to his Chappell, were royally feaſted, and the motion then made for the eſtabliſhing of peace, by the conjunction of the two Princes, whereunto the Scottiſh were as willing as the Engliſh, and proffered all forward aſſiſtance to haue it accompliſhed. So that theſe Nobles were deliuered without other ranſome, and richly rewarded at their departure from Court.

The Scottiſh priſoners releaſed without Ranſome.

(121) Theſe returned into Scotland, declared what they had done, and ſo effectually followed the buſineſſe, that in a Parliament aſſembled of the three Eſtates, the marriage was confirmed, and a peace proclaimed to continue betwixt the two Realmes the ſpace of ten yeers, which agreements were ſent into England by honourable Ambaſſadours, and there interchangeably ſealed betwixt theſe Potent Eſtates. But Cardinall Beton Archbiſhop of Saint Andrewes, fearing leſt Scotland would change the Church Orders, as England had done (the Bible already read in their owne language, and the Popes vſurped power called in Queſtion, as then it began to be, by the feruent preaching of Frier Guliam, to the great liking of moſt of the Lords) made ſome exceptions againſt the Earle Arraine the new-choſen Gouernour, being neereſt in bloud to the young Queene. And the French King not liking this vnion with England, ſought by all meanes to breake the ſame match: to effect which, he ſent the Earle of Lennox to perſwade with the Gouernour, with great proffers and promiſes of aſſiſtance, but finding him faithfull vnto King Henry, preſently made faction for the French, wherein he drew the Queen-Mother, the Earles Huntly, Argile, Montroſſe, Menteith, and many more Peeres, the Cardinall amongſt them euer the chiefe.

(122) Earle Lennox thus growne into credit with the Queene-Mother, and made ſtrong by her adherents that fauored the French, preſently claimed to be Gouernour of Scotland, being the ſecond perſon of degree in the Realme, and withall to haue the cuſtody of the yong Queene, who with her mother were forthwith taken from Linlithqw vnder the charge of the Gouernour Arraine, and brought vnto Striueling, ſtrongly guarded guarded, with the continuall presence of the Lords, Leuinston, Erskwin, Flemming, and Ruthwen, lest Queene Mary should bee conueyed into England vnto King Henrie. These violent courses, caused great emulations among the Scottish Nobility, each of them siding as their affections were settled, but lastly agree to set the Crowne on their young Queenes head: and prepared for the solemnity, whereunto all the Lords came, (excepting those that stood for England,) and by them the Gouernour with much adoe was drawne to bee present at the Coronation: but that accomplished, and the State-affaires consulted vpon, it was agreed that the French-Kings sute should bee fauoured, and that the Earle Arraine should be gouernor still, whereat Earle Lennox conceiued such displeasure, as he became wholly for King Henrie, and joyned himselfe with the Earles of Angus, Glencarne, and Cassils, the Lords, Maxwell, Summeruell, Gray, and others, that stood with the English for the match with Prince Edward.

(123) King Henry then hearing what was done, and intended; sent presently into Scotland, to demand the Custody of the young Queene, and that certaine Scottish Noble-men might be appointed to guard her in England, vntill shee came to yeeres of consent, according to Couenants formerly concluded; which no waies would be granted, and thereupon he prepared an army thitherward, vnder the conduct of Lord Edward Seimer Earle of Hertford, Lieutenant-Generall by Land, accompanied with the Earle of Shrewsbury, and a Fleete of two hundred saile by Sea, whereof Sir Iohn Dudley, Vicount Lisle, was Admirall.

(124) To the ayde of the Scots, the Popes Holinesse was very forward, who sent them the Patriarch of Venice as his Legate, and Orator, to perswade their Resolutions; with whom the French King sent Monsieur la Broche, and Monsieur Menager, to lead them to fight, and fifty thousand Crownes of the Sunne, to sustaine the Charge; with munition worth ten thousand Crownes more. It seemeth by Lesly, that part of this siluer fell into the Earle Lennox his hand, and that therewith he made head against the Gouernour, but not able to match him, sent vnto King Henry for aide, with proffer of his seruice against the French side, which so well was accepted of Henry, as he made him his Nephew, by giuing the Lady Margaret his sisters daughter to be his Wife.

(125) The English thus seconded with this vnlooked for alliance, Cardinall Beton thought good to bind all to the Gouernour, who with the authority of the Queene Dowager, proclaimed Lennox an enemy to the State. But in the meane-while the Admirall of England was entred the Frith, and at New-Hauen landed his men, where joyning his to the Land-Seruice, they al together marched thence towards Lieth, himselfe leading the Vaward, Shrewsbury the Rereward, and the Lord Lieutenant the maine Battell. These comming to Lieth, spoyled the Towne, and thence to Edenbrough, burnt the City, and wasted the Country for seuen miles about; this done, they set fire vpon Haddington, and Dunbarre, and then the whole Army returned vnto Barwicke.

(126) Whilest things thus passed in Scotland, and the maine purpose resting in suspence, King Henry well knew where the greatest rub did lye in his way, wch was the French King, the chiefest Abetter of the Scots, whom he euer vpheld, to hold him tacke at home, lest otherwise he should tugge with France for his owne right. And therefore hauing joyned with the Emperour against the French, sent his Herald, Garter, King at Armes, to demand certaine couenants, which if he refused, to proclaime defiance vnto open warres: but he not suffered to doe his message to the King, returned, and Henry prepared an expedition into France, wherein he imployed the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke, the Earles of Arundell, Oxford, and Surrey, the Lords, Russell, Grey, Ferrers, Mountjoy, and Sainct Iohn, besides many other seruiceable Knights, and Sir Iohn Dudley appointed high Admirall for the Seas. (127) The Duke of Suffolke in the meane-while strucke downe his Standards on the East-side of Bolloigne, and with many sharpe skirmishes, entred the base-Towne, which siege King Henry himselfe in person seconded, who hauing passed the Seas, from England, vpon the sixe and twentieth of Iuly, encamped before Bolloigne on the East-side, whence his Cannons so rent the Walls and Bulwarke, as their mounted tops lay vpon the Ground, and his great Morter-

Morter-peeces were discharged with so skilfull a compasse, that their bullets falling downe-right, beat all buildings downe vpon the Enemies heads. Whereby (saith Sleidan) in short time he got that, which neither his Father, nor the Kings in former times could neuer winne. For thereupon the Towne was surrendred and cleared of the French souldiers, women, and children.

John Sleidan. Comment.

(128) The King like a Conquerour with his Sword borne before him entred the Gate, where the Duke of Suffolke presented him with the Keyes of the Towne, the Trumpets still sounding, and nothing wanting that might applaud his fame. The Towne thus wonne, the English meant still to keepe; for the strengthening whereof, the King commanded the faire Church of S^t^. Maries to be taken downe, and in the same place, a mount to be raised for the planting of Ordnance, to annoy any siege. But being thus busied in Bolloignes affaires, the Emperour, without his knowledge or consent, came to a peace with the French King, whereat King Henry was sore displeased, and the sooner left France, leauing Sir Iohn Dudley Lord Lisle, his Deputie in Bolloigne, and landed at Douer the first day of October, to his great honour, and joy of his Subjects.

(129) The French King chafed with this late and great losse, sought to try fortune in further attempts, and that not only for the recouery of Bulloigne, (which with twenty-thousand well appointed he assayed) but also in assayling the English dominions, as the Ile of Wight, and those parts of Sussex that lay vpon the Seas, though with losse of many Captaines and thousands of Souldiers, that neuer returned to tell him what intertainement they had; as likewise in sending ayde vnto Scotland, where Monsieur Mungumry of the Order of France, with 5000. strong, entred to maintaine the breach betwixt them and King Henry, which was so followed on both parts, as the English making a Roade towards Gedworth, got praise for their valour, but reproach for their spoyles, and the Scots renowne for killing the Lord Eure, Lord Warden of the East-Marches, with many other Captaines in defence of their Countrey.

(131) But the warres remooued againe into France, the Reingraue with a great power came to victuall a Fort built neere vnto Bolloigne; to impeach which, the Earle of Surrey, then Lieutenant of the Towne, made forth, but was discomfited in the enterprize, and Sir Edward Poynings, Captaine of a Band, slaine, with fifteene other Captaines, besides many Officers and common Souldiers. These Princes warres in these violent proceedings, became very fearefull lest they would grow to the common hurt of Christendome, and therefore many other Potentates, whereof the Emperour was first, sollicited these Kings vnto a Peace, which the sooner was heard and imbraced, for that they were both of them old, and King Henry diseased in body. Commissioners therefore appointed, certaine Articles were agreed vpon: the first thereof was, that the French King should pay vnto King Henry, eight hundred-thousand Crownes in eight yeeres space, and then to re-enter vpon Bolloigne, but in the meane time it to remaine vnder the English; to accompliish which Peace, Mounsieur Danebalt, high Admirall of France, was sent into England; and Sir Thomas Cheynie, Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, to be the Kings Agent at the Font, for the Baptisme of the Dolphins new-borne Daughter.

King Henries death.

And in great penitency for his ſinnes, dyed vpon Thurſday the twenty eighth day of Ianuary, in the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 1546. when he had raigned thirtie ſeuen yeere, nine moneths, & fiue daies, and had liued fifty fiue yeeres, fiue moneths, and fiue daies, whoſe body with great ſolemnity was buried at Windſore, vnder a moſt coſtly and ſtately Tombe, begun in Copper and Guilt, but neuer neuer finiſhed, in the incloſures of whoſe Grates is curiouſly caſt this Inſcription: HENRICVS OCTAVUS REX ANGLIÆ, FRANCIÆ, DOMINVS HIBERNIÆ, FIDEI DEFENSOR: With what coſt and ſtate this his monument was intended, is manifeſted by a Manuſcript taken from the true modell thereof, which I receiued from that induſtrious Herald Maſter Nicholas Charles Lancaſter, and for the great magnificence is worthy here to be inſerted.

The manner of the Tombe to be made for the Kings Grace at Windſore.

Firſt, the Pauement whereupon the Tombe ſhall ſtand, ſhall be of Orientall ſtone: That is to ſay, of Alabaſter, Porfido, Serpentines, and other ſtones of diuers colours, as in the patterne is ſhewed.

Item, vpon the ſame Pauement ſhall be two great ſteps vnder all the worke, of like Orientall ſtones.

Item, the Baſement of the Pillars ſhall be of white marble, with Angels holding betweene them Crownes or Garlands guilt, as more plainely ſheweth in the Patterne.

Item, aboue the ſaid Baſement and Angels, ſhall be all the old Teſtament, that is to ſay, xiiij. Images in the xiiij. Caſements of the ſame two Pillars of the Prophets, and all the Pillars which ſhall be xvj. ſhall be of ſtones Serpentine, Porfido, and Alabaſter, and other fine Orientall ſtones, of ſuch colours as is ſhewed in the patterne; and the foot of euery pillar, and alſo the head ſhall be of Braſſe. And euery Prophet ſhall haue an Angell ſit at his foot, with Scripture of the name of his Prophet, and aboue ouer the head of the ſame ſhall be the ſtory of his Prophet: in euery of which ſtory ſhall be at leaſt viij. or xj. figures.

Item, aboue all the ſame Pillars ſhall be another Baſement of white marble, with a partition being made of ſuch fine Orientall ſtones as the pillars be, wherein ſhall be written ſuch Scripture as pleaſe you.

Item, aboue the ſame Baſement ſhall be the ſtory of the new Teſtament, that is to wit, with the Images of the Apoſtles, the Euangeliſts, and the foure Doctors of the Church, and euery Image ſhall haue ſitting at his foote a little childe, with a Scripture of the name of his Image, and a little Basket full of red and white Roſes, which they ſhall ſhew to take in their hands, and caſt them downe off the Tombe, and ouer the Pauement, and the Roſes that they ſhall caſt ouer the Tombe, ſhall be enamelled and guilt, and the Roſes that they caſt ouer the Pauements ſhall be of fine Orientall ſtones of white and red.

Item, behind all the ſame Images of the new Teſtament round about, ſhall be made in braſſe and guilt all the life of Ieſus Chriſt from the natiuitie to his aſcenſion, and it ſhall be ſo clearely and perfectly made, that the Myſtery of Chriſts life to his aſcenſion ſhall plainely appeare.

Item, aboue the ſaid new Teſtament and Images thereof, and aboue the ſaid life of Chriſt, ſhall be a Quire of xx. Angels ſtanding vpon a Baſement of white Marble, with great Candleſtickes in their hands, hauing lights in them ſhewing to honour and reuerence the ſame Tombe.

Item, all theſe foreſaid figures, ſtories, and ornaments ſhall be made to garniſh and ornate the two Pillars of the Church betweene which the Tombe ſhall be ſet.

Item, betweene the ſaid two great Pillars of the Church thus garniſhed, ſhall be a Baſement of white Marble of the height of the Baſement of the Pillars, and therein the Epitaph of the King and Queene, with letters of gold, of ſuch Scriptures as ye deuiſe.

Item, vpon the ſame Baſement ſhall be made two Tombes of blacke-Touch, that is to ſay, on either ſide one, and vpon the ſaid Tombes of blacke Touch ſhall be made the Image of the King and Queene on both ſides, not as death, but as perſons ſleeping, becauſe to ſhew that famous Princes leauing behinde them great fame, their names neuer doe die, and ſhall lie in royall Apparels after the antique manner.

Item, ouer the right hand, ouer both the ſides of the ſame Tombe ſhall be an Angell which ſhall hold the Kings Armes, with a great Candleſticke, hauing as it were light on it as a Lampe, and in like manner ſhall be another Angell holding the Queenes Armes on the left hand with a like Candleſticke.

Item, on the right hand and left hand on both the ſides ouer the ſaid Images of the King and Queene ſhall be two Angels, ſhewing to the people the bodies of the King and Queene, holding aboue their Heads veiles of Gold, and the Crownes of the King and Queene on their hands.

Item, betweene the ſaid two Tombes of blacke Touch, and the ſaid Angel ouer the King and Queene, ſhall ſtand an high Baſement like a Sepulchre, and on the ſides whereof ſhall be made the ſtory of S^t. George, and ouer the height of the Baſement ſhall be made an Image of the King on Horſe-backe, liuely in Armour like a King, after the antique manner, ſhewing in countenance and looking on the ſaid two Images lying on the ſaid Tombes.

Item, on the right hand and left hand of the ſaid two Tombes, ſhall be foure Pillers of the foreſaid Orientall ſtones, that is to ſay, on either ſide two Pillers, and vpon euery Piller ſhall be a like Baſement of white Marble with partitions for Scriptures as ſhall be aboue the other Pillers. And on the ſame foure Baſements of the ſaid Pillers ſhall be made foure Images, two of Saint Iohn Baptiſt, and two of S^t. George, with foure little Children by them, caſting Roſes, as is aforeſaid.

Item, ouer the ſaid Image of the King on Horſe-backe ſhall be made an Arch triumphall, of white Marble wrought within, and about it, and vpon the ſame arch, in manner of a Caſement of white Marble, garniſhed with like Orientall Stones of diuers colours, as the patterne ſheweth, and on the two ſides of the ſaid Caſement ſhall be made and ſet of braſſe guilt, the ſtory of the life of Saint Iohn Baptiſt, and one height of the ſaid Caſement ſhall be made fiue ſteps, euery one more then other downeward, of like Orientall ſtones, as the ſaid Pillers ſhall ſhew.

Item, on the foure corners of the ſaid Caſement ſhall be made the Images of the foure Cardinall vertues, hauing ſuch Candleſtickes in their hands as is aboue-ſaid.

Item, on the top of the higheſt ſtep of the ſaid fiue ſteps, on the one ſide, ſhall be an Image of the Father, hauing in his left hand the Soule of the King, and bleſſing with his right hand, with two Angels holding abroad the Mantle of the Father on either ſide.

Item, in like wiſe ſhalbe made, on the other ſide, the ſaid image of the Father, hauing the ſoule of the Queene in his left hand, bleſſing with his right hand with like Angels.

The height of the ſame worke from the Father vnto the Pauement ſhall bee xxviij. foot.

Item, the breadth and largeneſſe of the ſaid worke ſhall be xv. foot, and the Pillers of the Church in greatneſſe, v. foote: and ſo the largeneſſe of the ſaid worke, from the vttermoſt part of the two great Pillers ſhall bee xx. foote.

Item, euery of the Images of the xiiij. Prophets, ſhall containe euery Image V. foot in length, and the Angels ſhall containe two foote and a halfe in length.

Item, euery of the xx. Pillers ſhall containe in length X. foote.

Item, euery of the Images of the Apoſtles, Euangeliſts, and Doctors ſhall containe in length V. foote, and the Angels as is aboue-ſaid.

Item, in like wiſe euery of the xx. Angels of the quire ſhall containe in length two foot and a halfe, and in like wiſe the Images of the Children two foot and a halfe.

Item, the foure Images of Saint Iohn Baptiſt, and Saint George, and all the figures of the Father and Angels on the V. ſteps ſhall be V. foot.

Item, the foure Images of the King and the Queene ſhall be of the ſtature of a man and woman, and the foure Angels by them of the ſtature of a man euery one.

Item, the Image of the King on Horſe-backe with his Horſe ſhall be of the whole ſtature of a goodly man and large Horſe.

Item, there ſhall be Cxxxiiij. figures, Xliij. Stories, and all of Braſſe guilt, as in the patterne appeareth.

(135) But, Sic tranſit gloria mundi; for howſoeuer this Kings fame was thus intended, yet that great worke neuer came to perfection; but ſtandeth as a Monument how Kings, as other mortals, are but duſt and aſhes, when the breath of life in them is diſſolued, as the wiſeſt of Kings hath left vpon record in Eccleſiaſtes the ninth. This magnificent Monarch was of preſence Majeſticall, and of Perſonage more then ordinarily tall, faire of Complexion, and corpulent of body, very wiſe, and very well learned, of a ſudden and ready ſpeech, in youth very prodigall, and in his age very liberall, pleaſant, and affable, but not to be dallied dallied with, bold in attempting, and euer thirſtie of potent glory: an expert Souldier, and fauouring ſuch as were actiue or ſeruiceable, according to the then vſuall ſaying, King Henry loues a man: and indeed ſomewhat too well the delights with women, as by his many wiues here enſuing may well appeare.

His Wiues.

(136) Katherine the firſt wife to King Henry, was the daughter of Ferdinando the ſixth King of Spaine, and widdow-dowager of Prince Arthur his elder brother, as hath bin ſaid: ſhee was married vnto this King the third of Iune: and firſt of his Raigne, the yeere of Saluation 1509. being ſolemnely crowned with him vpon the twenty-fourth day of the ſame, and was his wife aboue twenty yeeres, and then diuorced from him by the ſentence of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; liued three yeeres after by the name of Katherine Dowager. Shee deceaſed at Kimbalton in the County of Huntington the eighth of Ianuary, and yeere of Chriſt 1535. and lyeth interred on the North-ſide of the Quire in the Cathedrall Church of Peterborow, vnder a hearſe of Blacke Say; hauing a white Croſſe in the middeſt.

An. Dom. 1533.

(137) Anne, the ſecond wife of King Henry, was the ſecond daughter of Sir Thomas Bullen, Earle of Wiltſhire and Ormond. Shee was ſolemnely at Windſor created Marchioneſſe of Pembrooke, the firſt of September, and twenty foure of his Raigne, hauing one thouſand pound giuen her by yeere, to maintaine her eſtate. Shee was married vnto King Henry in his Clozet at White-Hall, vpon the twenty-fift day of Ianuary, and yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 1533. being the foure and twentieth of his Raigne, and was crowned with all due obſeruances at Weſtminſter vpon Whitſunday the firſt of Iune, where the Crowne of Saint Edward was ſet vpon her head, the Scepter of Gold deliuered into her right hand, and the Iuory-rod, with the Doue, into her left. Shee was his wife three yeeres, three moneths, and twentie fiue daies, when being cut off by the ſword the nineteenth of May, her body was buried in the Quire of the Chappell in the Tower, leauing her accuſed fame to be cenſured as affections beſt pleaſed the vncharitable minded, and her bed to be poſſeſt of a vertuous Lady.

(138) Iane, the third wife of King Henry, was the daughter of Iohn Seimer Knight, and ſiſter to Lord Edward Seimer, Earle of Hertford, and Duke of Sommerſet. Shee was married vnto him the twentieth of May, euen the next day after the beheading of Queene Anne, and the twentie eighth of his Raigne. Shee was his wife one yeere, fiue moneths, and twenty foure dayes, and died in Child-bed the foureteenth of October, to the great griefe of the King, who not onely remooued from the place, but kept himſelfe priuate, and wore the Garment of mourning euen in the Feſtiuall time of Chriſtmas; her body was ſolemnely conueied to Windſor the eighth of Nouember following, where ſhee was interred in the middeſt of the Quire of the Church within the Caſtle.

(139) Anne, the fourth wife of King Henry, and ſiſter to William Duke of Cleue, was married vnto him the ſixth of Ianuary, in the thirty one yeere of his Raigne, the yeere of Grace 1540. ſhee was his Wife ſixe moneths, after which time certaine Lords of the vppet Houſe of Parliament came into the nether, and alledged cauſe for which that marriage was vnlawfull, whereupon ſhe was diuorced, and by Statute enacted, that ſhee ſhould no more be taken for Queene, but ſhould be called the Lady Anne of Cleue. Shee remained in England long after the Kings death, though ſmall mention is made of her by any of our Writers, onely we finde that ſhe accompanied the Lady Elizabeth thorow London, at the ſolemnizing of Queene Maries Coronation.

An. Dom. 1540.

(140) Katherine, the fifth Wife of King Henry the eighth, was the daughter of Edmund, and Neece vnto Thomas Howard his brother, Duke of Norfolke: She was married vnto him the eighth of Auguſt, and yeere of Grace 1540. being the thirtie two of his Raigne, at Hampton-Court, and continued his Queene the ſpace of one yeere, ſixe moneths, and foure dayes, when for her vnchaſt life, ſhe was attainted by Parliament, and for the ſame beheaded within the Tower of London the twelfth of February, and her body buried in the Chauncell of the Chappell by Queene Anne Bullen.

(141) Katherine, the ſixth and laſt wife of King Henry, was the daughter of of Sir Thomas Parre of Kendall, and ſiſter to Lord William Parre Marqueſſe of Northampton: She was firſt married to Iohn Neuill, Lord Latimer, and after his deceaſe, vpon the twelfth of Iuly married vnto the King at Hampton-Court, the yeere of Saluation 1543. and thirtie fiue of his Raigne: Shee was his wife three yeeres, ſixe moneths, and fiue daies, and ſuruiuing him, was againe married vnto Thomas Seimer Lord Admirall of England, vnto whom ſhe bare a daughter, but died in the ſame Childbed, the yeere of Grace 1548.

His Iſſue.

(142) Henry, the firſt ſonne of King Henry by Queene Katherine his firſt Wife, was borne at Richmond in Surrey, vpon the firſt of Ianuary, and the firſt of his fathers Raigne, whoſe Godfathers at the Font were the Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury, William Warham, and the Earle of Surrey: his Godmother Lady Katherine, Counteſſe of Deuonſhire, daughter to King Edward the fourth. This Prince liued not fully two moneths, but died in the ſame place wherein he was borne, vpon the two and twentieth of February, and his body with all due obſequies buried in Weſtminſter.

(143) A Sonne not named, was borne vnto King Henry by Lady Katherine, his firſt Queene, in the moneth of Nouember, and the ſixth yeere of his Raigne, who liued not long, and therefore no further mention of him can be made: the deaths of theſe Princes King Henry tooke as a puniſhment from God, for ſo he alledged it in the publike Court held in Blacke-Friers London, they being begot on his owne brothers wife.

(144) Mary, the third childe and firſt daughter of King Henry by Queene Katherine his firſt wife, was borne at Greenwich in Kent, the eighteenth of February, in the yeere of Chriſts humanity 1518. and the eighth of his Raigne. She was, by the direction of her mother, brought vp in her Child-hood by the Counteſſe of Salisbury her neere kinſwoman, for that as ſome thought, the Queene wiſhed a marriage betwixt ſome of her ſonnes and the Princeſſe, to ſtrengthen her Title by that alliance into Yorke, if the King ſhould die without iſſue Male. In her young yeeres ſhe was ſued to be married with the Emperour, the King of Scots, and the Duke of Orleance in France: but all theſe fayling, and ſhee ſucceeding her Brother King Edward in the Crowne, at the age of thirty ſixe yeeres, matched with Philip King of Spaine, to the great diſlike of many, and ſmall content to her ſelfe, he being imployed for the moſt part beyond the Seas, for griefe whereof, and the loſſe of Callis, ſhe laſtly fell into a burning-feauer, that coſt her her life. Holinſh. pag. 883.

(145) Elizabeth, the ſecond Daughter of King Henry, and firſt Childe by Queene Anne his ſecond Wife, was born at Greenwich, vpon Sunday the ſeuenth of September, the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 1533. and twenty fiue of her Fathers Raigne, who with due ſolemnities was baptized the Wedneſday following, Archbiſhop Cranmar, the old Dutcheſſe of Norfolke, and the old Marchioneſſe of Dorſet being the witneſſes at the Font, and the Marchioneſſe of Exceſter at the confirmation: Shee ſucceeded her ſiſter Queene Mary in the Monarchy of England, and was for wiſdome, vertue, pietie, and juſtice, not onely the Mirrour of her Sexe, but a patterne for Gouernement to all the Princes in Chriſtendome: whoſe name I may not mention without all dutifull remembrance, and whoſe memory vnto me is moſt deare, amongſt the many thouſands that receiued extraordinary fauors at her gracious and moſt liberall hand. An. Dom. 1533.

(146) Another man-childe Queene Anne bare vnto King Henrie, though without life, vpon the nine and twentieth of Ianuary, and twenty ſeuen of his raigne, to the no little griefe of the mother, and ſome diſlike of the King, as the ſequell of her accuſation and death did ſhortly confirme. Iob. Stowes Annal.

(147) Edward, the laſt child of King Henry, and firſt of Queene Iane, his third wife, was borne at Hampton-Court, the twelfth of October, the yeere of Grace 1537. and twenty nine of the Kings Raigne, being cut out of his mothers wombe as is conſtantly affirmed, like as Iulius Cæſar is ſaid to haue beene: his Godfathers at the Font, was Thomas Cranmar Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Norfolke, his ſiſter Lady Mary being Godmother, ſaith Grafton: Sixe daies after his birth he was created Prince of Wales, and at the death of his Father, ſucceeded him in all his dominions, of whom more followeth hereafter.

An. Dom. 1519. [In Stowes Annal.

(148) Henry Fitz-Roy, the naturall sonne of King Henry the eighth, was begotten of the Lady Talboise, called Elizabeth Blunt, and borne in the Mannor of Blackamoore in Essex, about the tenth yeere of his Raigne; at the age of sixe yeeres he was created Earle of Nottingham, and in the fiue and twentieth of his Fathers Raigne, vpon the eighteenth of Iune, in the Kings Palace of Bridewell, was made Duke of Richmond and Somerset, Lord Warden of the East, West, and Middle Marches against Scotland, and Lieutenant-Generall of all the parts of England Northward. He was a Prince very forward in Martiall Actiuities, of good literature and knowledge in the Tongues, vnto whom the learned Antiquary Leland dedicated a Booke; Hee married Mary daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke, Earle Marshall and Lord high Treasurer of England, with whom he liued not long, but dyed at Saint Iames by Westminster, the two and twentieth of Iuly, in the yeere of Christ Iesus 1536. and was buried at Framingham in Suffolke.

Thomas Milles. Holinshead saith at Thetford in Norfolke, pag. 1537.

THE

THE tempeſtuous ſtormes in the Raigne of this King Henry the eighth, and the violent deluge rayſed againſt the Church-ſtate of his times; bare downe ſo many Religious ſtrong foundations, and were the deſtruction of ſo many beautifull Monaſteries, as the onely relation of their numbers and names, would haue much interrupted the narration of his Hiſtory. Wherefore to retaine their memorials, (though their walls are laid waſte) aſwell for the reuerence wee owe vnto venerable Antiquitie, as for the example of their Founders holy zeale, wee haue inſerted a Catalogue of their names, orders, and true valuations, as in the originall Booke thereof taken by Commiſſion, and giuen vnto the King, wee finde them ſet downe, though at their diſſolutions their values were fauourably and farre vnder-rated. Some Founders, and times of foundations wee want; the reſt, Table-wiſe, (to auoid prolixitie) we haue ſet downe in this preſent following CHAPTER.

THE DIVINITY SCHOOLE AND LIBERARIE.

THE DIVINITY Schoole and LIBERARY, a moſt Magnificent and Stately building, was founded in the raigne of King Edward the fourth, as appeareth by his Armes and Supporters, viz. a Greyhound and a Bull, grauen in ſtone on the top of the vaults, in euery partitiō in the nether Roome now ſeruing for the Diuinity Schoole. The worke was done at the coſt and charges of diuers perſons Spirituall and Temporall: And as it ſhould ſeeme by the Armes of moſt of them, both cut in Stone in the roofe of the Vault, as alſo in the Windowes, there was an intention and generall contribution for this worke, long before it was begun, for that many of thoſe Benefactors whoſe Armes are there ſet vp, were dead long before the Fabrick was taken in hand. It was well furniſhed with Bookes, Richard Angeruil dyed long before this Libra-ry was built, & therefore is not to be named as a Benefactor. Humfrey D. of Glouceſter, who gaue 129 choyce Bookes, all of them Manuſcripts, which he procured out of Italy. It continued in good eſtate vntill the wauering and vncertaine time of King Edward the ſixt, when ſome ill-diſpoſed, out of their priuate auarice enuying the Common good, deſtroyed the Liberary, conuerting thoſe Bookes to their owne priuate vſe. But lately, in the raigne of our Soueraigne King Iames, this wrong and ſacriledge hath beene ſupplied by that worthy Mæcenas and Ptolomey of our times, Sir Thomas Bodley Knight, who hath beſtowed many thouſand pounds, not onely in getting the choyſeſt Authors and Bookes in all Chriſtendome, and from the remoteſt parts in the World; but alſo in making An. 1611. a new Croſſe-building anſwerable to the magnificy of the former worke, finiſhed Anno 1613. and a faire new Gallery ouer the building of the Schooles. So that now it is one of the chiefeſt Liberaries in the World, for vſe, ſtore of Bookes, and Magnificence.

Taken from the poſſeſſion of the Clergy by Henry the eight, and conuerted to temporall vſes out of the former ſummes, 161100. l. 9. s. 7. d. q. Since in this precedent Table, we haue laid to the Readers view a great part of this Kings ill, the waſte of ſo much of Gods reuenew (howſoeuer abuſed) let him not hold it in curioſity, out of ſeaſon, ſince it may in Charity fall well in ſequence by ſetting downe the Churches either erected, or reſtored by him, or by him (which is the now ſtate of our Clergy) continued, to redeeme his memory, blemiſhed by the former error from the vulgar aſperſion of ſacrilegious impiety.

This King after the diſſolution of the Religious houſes, erected theſe ſix Biſhopricks, to witte Weſtminſter, Cheſter, Peterborough, Oxford, Briſtoll, and Glouceſter, whereof the fiue laſt are in eſſe, and at the ſame time he erected alſo theſe Cathedrall Churches hereafter mentioned, wherein he founded a Deane, and the number of Prebends following, viz.

EDWARD

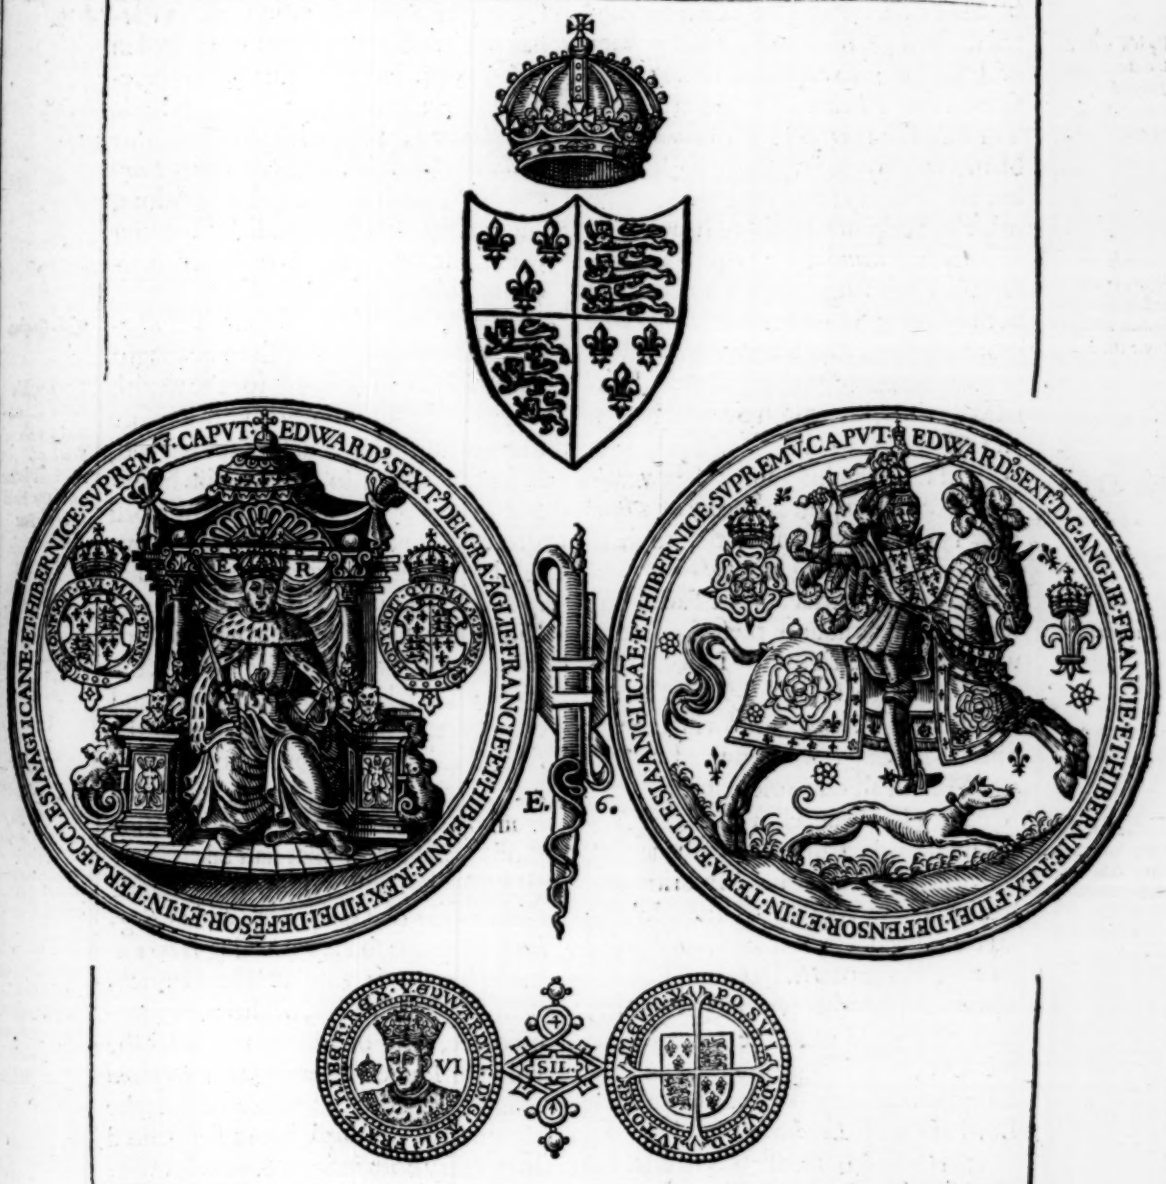
EDVVARD THE SIXTH OF THAT NAME, KING OF ENGLAND, FRANCE, AND IRELAND, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, &c. THE FIFTY NINTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH; HIS LIFE, ACTES, AND DEATH.

Monarch 59



CHAPTER XXII.

An. Dom. 1537.

EDVVARD the sixth of that Name, and only sonne liuing vnto King Henry the eighth, was borne at his Mannor of Hampton-Court in Middlesex, the twelfth of October, and yeere of saluation, 1537. and sixe dayes after being the eighteenth of the same moneth, he was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester: his birth was joyfull vnto the King and Commons; but the death of his Mother, the vertuous Queene Iane, brought immediate sorrow vnto both, whose

Rich. Grafton.

Edward created Prince of Wales, presently after his birth.

wombe was cut (as ſome haue affirmed) to the ſauing of his, but loſſe of her owne life, vpon whoſe death theſe elegant verſes were writ;

Alluding to the Creſt of her Father, a Phœnix in flames within a Crowne.

Phœnix Iana jacet nato Phœnice, dolendum
Sæcula Phœnices nulla tuliſſe duas.
Here lies the Phenix, Lady Iane, whoſe death a Phenix, bare,
O griefe, two Phenixs at one time, together neuer were.

(2) Nine yeeres and odde moneths hee was vertuouſly trained vp in the life of his Father, and at his death appointed the firſt of his heires, and for want of Iſſue (if it ſo chanced) Mary, and ſhee failing, Elizabeth to ſucceed in his Throne: for as Henry with Salomon was blame-worthy for women, ſo left hee but one ſonne and two daughters, as the other in Scripture is ſaid to haue done: Salomon had Rehoboam a foole, and vnfortunate, his daughters, but obſcure, and both of them Subjects; but Henry was more happy in Edward his ſonne, who prooued another young Salomon himſelfe, and his ſiſters both Soueraignes of an Imperiall Crowne.

By his will dated the 30. of December, Ann. Dom. 1546.

Salomon and Henry compared in their ſinnes, and in their Iſſue.

(3) He began his raigne the twentie eighth of Ianuary, in the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 1546. and the laſt of that moneth was proclaimed King of England, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, and ſupreme Gouernour of theſe Churches, with other his rightfull Titles to his Imperiall Stiles belonging. And on the twentieth of February following, being Shroue-Sunday, was crowned at Weſtminſter with all due Solemnities.

(4) His Councellors were appointed by his ſicke Father, as we haue ſaid, and Protector ouer his Minoritie and Realmes (by conſent of the Nobles) was ordained his Vncle Edward Lord Seimer, Earle of Hereford and Duke of Sommerſet, brother vnto Queene Iane, who thereupon gaue the young King the Order of Knight-hood, and the King immediately did the like vnto the Lord Major of London.

The Duke of Hereford made Protector by Parliament.

(5) His firſt buſineſſe was to eſtabliſh God ſeruice, who had eſtabliſhed him in the Throne, and as another Ioſiah in godly zeale, deſtroyed Idolatry, by pulling downe Images in England, as that King in Iudah did the Altars of Baalim; ſought the Saluation of his Subjects, by ſending forth Preachers to inſtruct the people, as Ioſiah did the Leuites, the teachers of Iſrael vnto their charges; brought the Bible in a knowne language to be read in the Church, as he did the Arke into the Temple of the Lord; commanded the ancient and true vſe of the Sacrament in both kinds, as Ioſiah commanded the Paſſeouer both to be kild & celebrated in Ieruſalem, and in all things prooued another Ioſiah indeed.

Statutes Edw. 6. Ann. 1.

(6) And as Edward was buſied in ſetting forth Gods glory, ſo the Protector and Councell were carefull for the State of the Realme, and eſpecially for their Kings marriage with Mary the young Queene of Scotland, vnto which a Parliament at Edenburgh had conſented in Anno 1543. and for confirmation thereof, had ſent into England, William Earle of Glancarn, Sir George Dowglas, Sir William Hamilton, and Sir Iames Leirmound, Scottiſh Knights, Ambaſſadors, vnto King Henry deceaſed, betwixt whom the contracts were ſealed interchangeably as we haue ſaid.

(7) And now by the Councell of England was thought moſt fit to be ſought after, and conſummated, for the wealth and peace of the whole Iland: wherefore they publiſhed their deſires to that end, in an Epiſtle ſent to the Scottiſh Nobility, directed vnto them by the Lord Protector; wherein they were remembred of the many incurſions, roades, and ſpoiles, committed & done, vpon either Kingdome through their continuall hoſtilities, and wars: ſhewing likewiſe the neereneſſe of language, lineaments, and conditions of the nations, inhabiting the ſame Iland; and therefore a moſt ſure token (as they tooke it) to be deſcended from one & the ſame Originall; vrging Gods prouidence, that had taken away all the Male-Princes of Scotland, leauing them onely one daughter; and in England, only one ſonne vnto King Henry among his many wiues. Their Princes themſelues for yeeres, qualities, & magnificence, fitly ordained to contract the vnion of Peace: alleaging that England ſought neither the preeminence, nor the conqueſt of Scotland, but rather deſired an equality both in State & gouernment; and to that end offered to take the name of Britaines, indifferent to both, though diſhonorable to themſelues, in bereauing their Nation of the glory atchieued, in many of their victories. Theſe notwithſtanding, the Scottiſh perſiſted to beſtow their young Queene another way.

The Engliſh made Proclamation in Scotland.

(9) The Gouernour of Scotland hearing newes of many Caſtles ſurrender and ſurprize, and feares daily increaſing by augmented reports, commanded his Heraulds with all poſſible diligence, to paſſe thorow all the parts of the Realme, and the Fire-Croſſe to be borne whereſoeuer they came; a Cuſtome indeed anciently vſed in greateſt extremity, and onely then after this manner, two fire-Brands ſet a-Croſſe, were carried vpon the point of a ſpeare, with Proclamation of the eminent danger, calling for aide, aſſigning the time and place, when and whither they were to reſort: yet there be that ſay, It was a painted red Croſſe ſet vp for certaine dayes in the Field of that Barony, whereunto the aide ſhould come: and thoſe that refuſed, being aboue ſixteene, and vnder ſixty, were accounted traitours, and their land confiſcated to the King. The Scottiſh Army thereupon remoued ſomewhat Southward, ſeeking to get the higher ground, with aduantage both of Sun and winde, the deſire whereof cauſed them little to regard the helpe of Horſe, but for haſte drew their great Ordnance thitherward onely by maine ſtrength of men.

But God, who is the disposer of Kingdomes, and hath the hearts of Princes in his owne hand, in his vnsearchable decrees, saw it not time to vnite as yet, the whole Iland vnder one Crowne, to which end he suffered the French to assist the Scots, and England to be burthened with her owne ciuill broyles.

(18) For the Protector returned, and a Parliament at London assembled, all Colledges, Free-chappels, and Chanteries, were giuen to the King, wherin was repealed the Statute formerly made, and cõmonly called the Sixe Articles, which had beene the cause of many Martyrs deaths in the dayes of King Henry his Father, as also other enacted by King Richard the second, & Henry the fift, for the suppression of Scriptures in English, and other points held, in their dayes accounted hereticall, at which time also iniunctions went forth to cleanse the Church of all Images, and Commissioners sent with authority to pull them down, who first began at the Cathedrall Church of S^t. Pauls in London, and thence proceeded, casting downe those Idols in all the Churches thorowout England and Wales. The Kings anſwer and generall pardon.

(23) To theſe their Demands the King ſent an anſwer, therein pittying their ignorance, and blaming their folly, and therewithall his Generall pardon, to as many as would deſiſt whiles it was time. Firſt, he reproued them, for their preſumptions, thus contumeliouſly to riſe againſt their dread Soueraigne, to the diſturbance of his loyall Subjects peace; whoſe ſimplicity they had notoriouſly abuſed, in vſing his name to draw them into action of Rebellion: and no leſſe likewiſe in the grounds of their demands. As in their firſt Article for Baptiſm, where it was well known, the ſame was admitted as neceſſity required, or rather commanded by the Booke of Common Prayer, publiſhed by authority of Parliament, and as themſelues knew in preſent practice. But touching the Sacrament in their ſecond Article, how impudently they did belie the true receiuers thereof, was manifeſt, who make ſo much difference in that holy adminiſtration, that they account no profit in Common bread, beſides the nouriſhment of their naturall Bodies: but this bleſſed bread to be the food of their ſoules vnto eternall life. And as you are ſeduced in theſe (ſaith the admonition) ſo in confirmation alſo they carry your ſimplicities captiue, for the truth teacheth no otherwiſe then themſelues beleeue, namely, that a Child baptized, and dying before confirmation, is neuertheleſſe in ſtate of Grace, elſe are themſelues cauſers of their childrens damnation: ſo the ſeruice of God brought from an vnknowne tongue, cannot ſurely offend any reaſonable man, which is onely to make him vnderſtand that, which before he knew not, and to giue his conſent to thoſe prayers, whereof hee hath moſt need, and giueth the neereſt touch to his owne feeling conſcience, for God requireth the heart onely, which with an vnderſtanding ſeruice we muſt ſacrifice vnto him. But moſt of all (ſaith this good King) we maruell at your demand, for the ſixe Articles reſtored, to haue them in power as formerly hath beene. Doe you know what you aske, or in obtaining doe you know what you get? They were lawes indeed lately made, but quickly repented; too cruell for you, and too mercileſſe for vs; who would haue our Raigne written with milke, and not with blood, and becauſe they were bloody, we tooke them away, with the ſame authoritie, by which they were made; leſt retaining them, our Sword ſhould be too often drawne, and rigour extended vpon our true and well-deſeruing ſubjects. Wee for our parts ſeeke no longer to liue, then to be a father vnto our people, and as God hath made vs your rightfull King, ſo hath he commanded you vnto obedience: by whoſe great Majeſty we ſweare, you ſhall feele the power of the ſame God in our ſword; which how mighty it is, no ſubject knoweth: how puiſſant it is, no priuate man can judge, and how mortall, no Engliſh heart can thinke: therefore embrace our mercy while it is offered, leſt the blood ſpilt by your means, cry vengeance from the Earth, and be heard in the eares of the Lord in Heauen.

(24) All this notwithſtanding, the Rebels perſiſted in their traiterous attempts: againſt whoſe ſeditions Sir Iohn Ruſſell Lord Priuy Seale, was appointed General of the Kings Army, vnto whoſe aſſiſtance was joyned the Lord Grey of Wilton, vnder whom ſerued a band of Italians intended againſt Scotland, theſe lay at Briſtow, attending the comming of the Lord Generall, who now was marched Weſtward to Honiton, where daily looking for more ſupply, thoſe which hee had, began to ſhrinke away, whereby the Rebels were emboldened to make towards him, and came as far as Fenington-bridge within three Miles of Honiton, and in a faire Meadow there ſpred their Colours. The Lord Ruſſell, though weake in compariſon of them, holding it more honour to aſſaile, then to be aſſaulted, made forward euen vnto the Bridge: at whoſe ſight the Enemies prepared thẽſelues to fight, and with a ſtrong guard maintained the Bridge, beſides which there was no paſſage ouer the Riuer, that held his courſe betwixt the two Armies.

(25) Great were the attempts the Lord Lieutenant gaue, and manfull was the reſiſtance that the Rebell made, yet laſtly the way was wonne, and followed vnto the battell of the diſloyals: where preſently began a moſt cruell fight, and a while was maintained to the loſſe of their blood: but the falſe hearts fayling, and the true ſubjects courage increaſing, the Corniſh immediately gaue backe and fled, whereat the Kings ſouldiers out of Order fell to the ſpoile, minding nothing leſſe then that which preſently enſued: for the Corniſhmen perperceiuing their disordered carriage, suddenly returned, and began a new fight, when the Lord Russell likewise ordered anew his Army: these furiously ioyning, a sharpe and cruell encounter ensued, with the losse of much blood, and the liues of three hundred Rebels, who lastly tooke to their heeles, and left the field: the chase a while followed, and the Souldiers scattered, a fearefull cry suddenly arose, that all the Commons were vp, which caused the Lord Generall to returne vnto Honiton, whither shortly came the Lord Grey of Wilton, hauing in pay Spinola an Italian Captaine with three hundred shot.

The Rebels returne & maintaine the fight.

And againe put to flight.

(26) The Lord Russels forces augmented, his greatest care was to releeue the City Excester, whither vpon the third of August he hasted from Honiton being 1000. strong; and passing ouer the Downes towards Woodbury, lodged his Campe that night neer to the Wind-Mill, whereof the Rebels hauing intelligence, raised themselues from Saint Mary Clift, and made amaine vnto the Downes, thinking to surprize the Lord Generall before he was ready; but he as vigilant as they were forward, encountred them againe in battell, and againe gaue them the ouerthrow with the losse of the most of their liues, the rest escaping by flight, got vnto the Towne of Saint Mary Clift.

The Rebels againe ouerthrowne.

(27) The newes wherof bruted, and the Papall side bruised by these three ouerthrowes, the Commons in whole troupes resorted to their aide, and to make all sure on their side (by the presence and helpe of their consecrated god) they brought into the field the Crucifixe vnder a Canopy, which in stead of an Altar was set in a carte; accõpanied with Crosses, & Candlesticks, Banners, Holy Bread, and Holy-Water, both to driue away Diuels, and to dull their enemies swords; wch notwithstanding they did not, neither could they deliuer themselues in the day of destruction; for the Towne being fired, and the Armies met vpõ Clift heath, a most cruell & bloody battell was fought, wherin was slain the whole rout of the Rebels, and all these trinkets cast in the durt.

(28) The chiefe Captaines were taken and sent vnto London, who were Humfrey Arundell, Winsland, Holmes, and Bury, who there paid the law with the losse of their liues. Many others were executed without iudgement, onely by Marshall Law, as was Boier Major of Bodmin in Cornwall, vnto whom Sir Anthony Kingston, Prouost Marshall, sent word he would visit him at dinner, but before he was set downe, commanded the Major to cause a paire of Gallowes to be set vp; and the table taken away, hee willed the said Major to accompany him to the place, and there presently commanded Boier his Oast to the halter, and saw him hanged before he departed.

(29) At the same time, and neere the same place dwelled a Miller, who had beene a busie doer in the Rebellion, but hee knowing the danger, willed his man to take the name of the master, if any enquired after him; wherupon the said Sir Anthony came to the mill, and calling for the master, the man in his name presented himselfe, who strait commanded him vnto the Gallowes: the seruant then seeing the danger of death, confessed he was not the master, but the man. Well, said the Knight, thou canst neuer doe thy master better seruice then to hang for him, and thereupon trussed him vp in the next tree.

A Millers man hanged for his master.

(30) As these things were in acting in the West, so other commotions arose in other parts of the Land, though broched vnder another pretence, namely the laying opẽ of inclosures, which the King by Proclamation had commanded to be done, but many offenders bearing themselues out with greatnesse, slackened the execution, and the poorer presuming vpon the Kings pleasure, began to execute his Commission themselues, and those in many places at once, as in Kent, Essex, Sommerset, Buckingham, Northampton and Lincolne-shires they did.

(31) But most dangerous was that in Norfolke, whose Inhabitants following the examples of the rest, held out much longer, & in more violent maner. Their first attempt was at Atilborough against one Greene that had taken away part of their cõmons, next at Wimonham, where by the instigation of Iohn Flowerdew, they cast down the fences of Inclosures, belonging to Robert Ket a Tanner in the same Town; who to be euen with Flowerdew, brought them to Hetherset, and set them on work to pull down both hedge and ditch of his pasture grounds inclosed: to which worke he gaue such desperate incouragements, that these vnrulies presently chose him for their ringleader, who with them passed to Bowthrope, laying all leuell where they came.

(32) Their number encreasing, and doings outragious, Sir Edmund Windam Knight, at that time high Shiriffe of the Shire, made proclamation among them in the Kings name to depart, which if they did not forthwith, he pronounced them Traitors: but had not his Horse bin the swifter, he had bin either taken or slaine: thereupon their terror began to be fearfull, and themselues to be furnished with weapons, Armour and Artillery daily brought them in abundance by the By-dwellers, besides store of victuals to maintaine their campe.

(33) But now considering what dangers were open, if dispersedly scattered they should attend their bad worke, they held it best policy to draw to one place: and to fortifie themselues together with further strength; whereupon with full resolution, Monshold was thought fittest neere vnto Mount Surrey, a place built by these Earles of that County, and vpon S. Leonards hill which hangeth ouer Norwich, they vnkenelled themselues; besides these of Monshold, a lesser rabble of them lay at Rising-chase neere Linne, which were rowsed thence by the Gentlemen of those parts: who first from Watton, then from Thetford, and next from Brandon, were forced to their litter at Monshold.

Monshold the place of the randeuow.

(34) Their parts were rigorous, or rather inhumane euen to their well-willers, for it is a knowne truth, that Sir Roger Woodhouse in kinde courtesie bringing them two Carts laden with Beere, and another with victuals, was recompenced with the losse of all his Horses, his owne apparell, and his body tugged, and torne, cast into a ditch, who lastly, with others was imprisoned by them in the house of Mount Surrey, and yet would they seeme very Religious, hauing one Coniers for their Chaplen, who deuoutly said seruice vnto them both morning and euening.

The inhumanities of the Cõmotioners.

(35) To these, the lewdly disposed of Suffolke assembled, as also the scumme and dregs out of Norwich, adding still fewell to their owne smoaky flames, by fireing of Beacons, ringing of Bels, and what not, to set all in an vproare: some true and faithfull subiects they violently led away, and made them of their councell, namely, Thomas Cod Maior of Norwich, Robert Watson Preacher, and Thomas Alderiche Gentleman, Sergeant Catlyn, and Sergeant Gaudy, whom they kept fettered, & compelled them to be attendant vpon Kette; who now tooke vpon him to be the Kings Deputy, and to giue out warrants in his Maiesties name, by vertue of which, many of Worship and credit were fetched from their dwellings, brought before him, and violently cast into prison: their Rabble encreased to the number of sixteen thousand men.

Many good subiects forced to attend vpon the Rebels.

(36) And that the shew of Iustice and Piety was only the marke wherat these lawlesse leuelled, they ordained a Tribunall seat in an old tree, whose Canopie was the Cope of Heauen: in this sate the Tanner as Chancellor or chiefe Iudge, accompanied with his Councellors, assisted by two chosen men out of euery hundred among them: hither assembled the complaints of the Campe, and hence had they commission to fetch out of Ships both Ordnance, Powder and shot, and out of Gentlemens houses all abiliments of warre: and heere such Raskals as had exceeded their commission, had iudgement of imprisonment, so that this tree was termed, The Oake of Reformation, whence likewise sometimes Sermons were deliuered to the people, and once by the Reuerend Doctor Parker, which had almost cost him his life.

The tree of Reformation.

(37) To these the Kings generall Pardon was publikely pronounced by an Herald at Armes, but so farre off from embracing, as the rebels from the height of the hill, shot at the City: which doing little harme, they remoued their Ordnance to the lower ground, and thence beganne to batter the walles, and without great resistance entred the towne, where they became Masters of all the munitions, and emprisoned the Maior, and many other Citizens.

Norwich wonne by the Rebels.

(38) These times thus troublesome, the King sought to quiet, and to that end sent the L. William Parr, Marquesse of Northampton, with 1500. horsemen vnto Norwich, accompanied with the Lords Sheffeild, and Wentworth, besides many Knights; who at his first comming thither, summoned the City to yeeld; the Magistrates whereof as willingly obeyed, and repairing to his Standard, yeelded vp their Cities sword vnto him; declaring themselues true subiects to the King, though some of the baser sort had fauoured Kets doing, and with them immediately the L. Marquesse entred the City, which the same night was assaulted by the Rebels, whom he manfully resisted, and slew 300. of their riotous rout.

(39) The next day following, theſe blood-hounds vnkennelled by troupes, and entring the City by the Hoſpitall, began a moſt cruell fight, wherein the Lord Sheffield, by the fall of his Horſe into a ditch, was butcherly ſlaine by a Butcher, as he ſought to recouer himſelfe, and the Rebels now fleſhed with this their fortunate chance, followed the chaſe with ſuch ſlaughter and cry, that they forced the Lord Marqueſſe to forſake the Citie, and therein tooke Sir Thomas Cornwallis priſoner, whom they ſtraitly kept in durance till their laſt ouerthrow. Norwich they ranſackt and ſet on fire, whoſe aſhes as yet fill vp their ruines, and more had beene made, had not God quenched theſe flames by ſhowres from Heauen.

The Lord Marqueſſe forced out of Norwich.

(40) The Lord Marqueſſe returned, and the Rebels holding Norwich, it was more then time to looke to the maine chance; and therefore thoſe forces that were gathered to inuade others, were now thought the fitteſt to ſecure our ſelues, ouer whom was appointed the Lord Iohn Dudley, the warlike Earle of Warwicke: hee comming to Cambridge prepared for the enemy, whither reſorted the foreſaid Lord Marqueſſe, the Lords, Willoughby, Powes, and Grey, his ſonnes Ambroſe and Robert, with many of the Norfolke men, and the twenty three of Auguſt ſhewed himſelfe vpon the plaine before Norwich, whence to ſaue the effuſion of blood, he ſent Norrey and a Trumpet to ſummon the City, and to offer a generall pardon; which being againe refuſed, hee cauſed his Ordnance to be planted againſt S. Steuens gate, and his Pioners to breake open the Brazen gate, whereat many made entry, and diuers were ſlaine.

The Lord Dudley made Generall againſt the Rebels of Norfolke.

(41) S^t. Steuens gate forced open by Canon ſhot, the Earle of Warwick entred the Citie, and with ſmall reſiſtance came into the Market place, where threeſcore Rebels were incontinently executed by Marſhall law. But the Earles carriages paſſing thorow the Citie, were ſurprized and taken by the enemy, wherin was great ſtore of powder and ſhot, which with triumph they conueyed to their Campe, and tooke it a ſigne of further ſucceſſe, their want conſiſting moſt in thoſe prouiſions; whereupon they manned the ſtreets of that City, and ſlew very many of the Kings friends: but the ſhowres of arrowes and ſhot from the Kings Subiects ſo rained amongſt them, that they were forced backe to take ſhelter in Monſhold their hole of refuge.

The Earle entreth the City Norwich, and executeth 60. Rebels by Marſhall law.

(42) The Earle of Warwicke thus maſtring the Citie, ſhut all the Gates, them onely excepted that gaue way toward Monſhold, and thoſe hee planted with his great Artillery. The Rebels perceiuing what hee went about, ſuddenly made downe towards the Gate, and with great courage and confuſed cries, fell with ſuch violence vpon their attendants, that they gaue backe and fled, leauing their Ordnance to the will of the Rebels, who preſently diſpoſed them amongſt their owne, ſo that the Earle ſtopped likewiſe thoſe paſſages, and imploied all his endeuour to defend the City, which notwithſtanding hee could not, the Rebels making incurſions ouer the riuer from their well-ſtored Campe: and ſetting the ſtreets in many places on fire, whoſe attempts ſo continued and proſpered to euill, as ſome deſpairing of any good, councelled the Earle to be gone. But ſo farre was hee from ſuch ſtaine of honor, that drawing forth his own ſword, commanded other to doe the like, and with an interchangeable kiſſe confirmed the reſolution of his bold courage: a cuſtome indeed vſed in greateſt danger of warre. And thereupon determining another way to worke, ſought to ſtop the paſſage from all conuoy of victuall; which the Rebels perceiuing, ſet fire on their Cabbines, and with Enſignes diſplayed, entrenched themſelues at the foote of the Hill, in the valley called Duſſin-dale, partly vpon vaine Prophecies pronounced among them by certaine wizzards, who gaue forth that Hob, Dic, and Hic, (meaning the Ruſtickes) with their Clubs ſhould fill vp the valley of Duſſindale with the bodies of the dead.

(43) The next day being the ſeuen and twentieth of Auguſt, the Lord Generall prepared for fight, hauing newly receiued a ſupply of foureteene hundred Lances. But before that Mars ſhould trie his ſtrength by ſword, he ſent vnto them a generall Pardon for all things that were paſt; which when they had againe vtterly reiected, he ranged his battels for fight. The Kings Standard ſtrucke.

(44) But before the charge could be giuen, one Miles, a moſt skilfull Gunner amongſt them, made ſhot at the Kings Standard, and ſtrucke the Bearer thereof in the thigh, and his Horſe thorow the ſhoulder, which ſo mooued the Earle, that he cauſed a whole volley of Artillery to be diſcharged againſt them, when Captaine Drury with his owne band and the Almanes, thruſt ſore vpon them, and opened their Battell, whereby moſt of the Captiue-Gentlemen eſcaped away; vpon which brunt the Earles light Horſe-men came ſo valiantly on, that the Rebels gaue backe and fled: and with the formoſt Robert Ket their Captaine, vpon a ſwift Horſe galloped away; the Chaſe continued three miles and more, with the ſlaughter of three thouſand and fiue hundred Rebels.

The Rebels diſcomfited, and many ſlaine.

(45) Their battell thus broken, and the moſt part fled: thoſe notwithſtanding that kept about the Ordnance, determined to die like men, and incloſing themſelues among the Carts and Carriages, had the aduantage of a Trench and certaine ſtakes ſtucke againſt the Horſemen, whereby they ſtood more reſolutely at defence. The Noble Earle pitying their caſe, and loth to loſe ſo many braue men, ſent Norrey King at Armes vnto them, with proffer of pardon if they would lay downe Armes, and returne to obedience, otherwiſe they well ſaw, there was no way but death. Their anſwer was, that they were free borne Engliſh-men, who diſdained all ignominious death, whereunto they ſaid, they were appointed, and barrels of ropes brought into the field (as they were informed) to ſtrangle them, ſo that if they muſt needs die, they choſe the manly deaths of Souldiers, not truſting the ſugred promiſes for ſurprize, and then to be truſſed vp like Dogs.

The noble Act and loue of the Lord Generall.

(46) Their anſwer returned, and compaſsion ſtill working in the Lord Generals breſt, euen when hee had ſet his whole Army againſt them both of horſe and foote; and the ſigne of battell ready to haue beene giuen, hee ſent to them once more, to know if they would beleeue and imbrace their pardon, if hee came in perſon to declare it to them himſelfe; whereunto they anſwered, that they knew him to be honourable, and would from his mouth moſt thankefully receiue it: thereupon he repayred vnto them, and cauſing againe their pardon to bee read, confirmed the ſame with ſuch effectuall words, as they all caſt away their weapons, and with one voice cryed, God ſaue King Edward.

The Rebels yeeld and receiue the Kings pardon.

(47) The day following, Ket the Captaine of this ſedition, crept into a Barne of one Mr. Riches of Swanington, was by two of his ſeruants apprehended, & with 20. Horſemen conueied to Norwich, where 9. of the chiefeſt Rebels had iudgement of death, and were all of them hanged vpon the Oake of Reformation, which not till then, had the true note of that name. Ket with his brother William were brought vnto London, and thence backe againe into Norfolke, where William Ket the yonger was hanged vpon the high Steeple of Windmondham, and Robert Ket the Arch-Rebell in chaines vpon the Caſtle of Norwich, whoſe Citizens annually ſolemnized the day of their deliuery with no leſſe ioy, then the Iewes did when they had eſcaped the ſword of wicked Haman.

Among theſe the moſt ſeditious had euer a voice, which drew conſent to forward the Action, and eſpecially to beare downe the rich, wherof they made their firſt aſſay vpon White a Gentleman, Sauage a Marchant, Clopton and Berry; whom they cruelly murthered, and diſpoiling them of their apparell, left their naked bodies on the Would before Seimer, thence paſſing forward from Town to Towne, tooke many away that were vnwilling to goe, and all to fulfill their perfidious propheſie.

(52) As the Commons by theſe tumultuous rebellions greatly diſquieted the peace of the Land, ſo the chiefeſt Lords did diſturbe the Court of the young King, where the greateſt Councellours through emulation and diſdaine, banded each againſt others, without reſpect of themſelues, or regard of their Soueraigne; whereof the Kings Vncles, the Protector and Admirall are noted for the firſt, and with the firſt paid their offences with their liues: they both were the brethren of Queene Iane the Kings mother deceaſed: the elder Lord Edward Duke of Somerſet, was Protector of his Perſon, Realmes and Dominions. And Thomas Lord Seimer Baron of Sudley the younger, high Admiral of England, both worthy perſons, had they knowne their owne worths: for ſo long ſtood they in ſafety of life & true honor, as the bounds of brotherhood and nature ſtood vnuiolated betwixt them: but that once broken, their liues lay open to diſhonour and death.

And the Dutcheſſe of Somerſet matched with the greateſt Peere in the Land, held her State equall to her husbands degree: and for place and precedency, as report hath diuulged, the lamentable Tragedy of theſe two great Brethren began; which now in acting brought vpon the Stage at once their owne deſtructions, the Lands rebellions, and the griefes of the good young King, into a fatall and vnrecouerable ſickneſſe, whereof laſtly followed his death.

Inſomuch that the Protector ſuffred his brother to bee accuſed and condemned in Parliament of High Treaſon (whether true or falſe, God only knoweth) and vnder his own hand writing, committed his head to the axe: wherby one of the three twiſted cords of Englands ſtrength was cut aſunder by that fatal & vnhappy ſtroake, and his own now made looſe in the Cable, proued too weake by far to hold faſt the Anchor, whereby the ſhipwracke of his owne life was ſhortly made.

(60) Whither ſhortly after the Lords themſelues repaired, and charged the Protector with theſe 20. Articles as followeth:

Articles drawn againſt the Lord Protector.

1 That at his entry into that waightie office, he was expreſly prohibited to doe any thing in State, without the aſſent of the laſt Kings Executors.

2 That he had contrariwiſe vpon his own authority both ſubuerted lawes, and ſtaied juſtice, as well by letters, as commandement. (3) That

3 That he had deliuered diuers perſons arreſted and committed to priſon for felony, man-ſlaughter, murther and treaſon, contrary to the lawes and ſtatutes of the Realme.

4 That hee had made Captaines and Lieutenants ouer waightie affaires vnder his owne Seale and Writing.

5 That hee had alone communicated with forraigne Ambaſſadors about moſt weightie State-affaires.

6 That hee had checked diuers of the Kings Priuy Councell, ſpeaking for the good of the State, yea and threatned to diſplace them if they conſented not to his minde.

7 That hee had againſt law erected a Court of Requeſts in his owne houſe, whither were inforced diuers of the Kings Subiects to anſwer for their Freeholds.

8 That hee had for money diſpoſed Offices in the Kings gift, money, leaſes, and Wardes, and giuen preſentations of Benefices, and Biſhopricks, yea and medled with ſale of the Kings lands, which by office he could not, without conſent of the major voice of the Councell.

9 That he had commanded multiplication by Alcumiſtry, to the abuſe of the Kings Coine.

10 That againſt the King and Councels will, he had ſet forth a Proclamation againſt Incloſures, which had cauſed dangerous inſurrections in the Land, wherein diuers of the Kings liege Subiects haue beene ſpoiled, and many a worthy man therein ſlaine.

11 That to the ſame end he had giuen commiſſion with Articles annexed concerning Incloſures of Commons, high wayes, and decayed Cottages, giuing the Commiſſioners authoritie to heare and determine the ſame cauſes, contrary to the lawes and ſtatutes of the Realme.

12 That he had ſuffered Rebels and Traitors to aſſemble, and lie in Campe and Armour, againſt the King, his Nobles and Gentlemen, without any ſpeedy ſuppreſſing of them.

13 That by his gifts in mony, with promiſes of Fees, rewards and ſeruices, hee had incouraged many of the ſaid rebels.

14 That in fauour of them contrary to law, he had cauſed a Proclamation to be made, that none of the ſaid Rebels or Traitors ſhould be ſued, or vexed for any of their offences committed in the ſaid Rebellion.

15 That hee had liked well of theſe rebellions, and had ſaid, That the couetouſneſſe of the Gentry gaue the occaſion, affirming that it was better for the Commons to die, then to periſh for lacke of liuing.

16 That he had reported the Lords of the Parliament were loth to reforme themſelues for the reformation of Incloſures, and therefore the people had good cauſe to reforme the things themſelues.

17 That vpon the report of the defaults and lackes of Bulloigne, nothing was there amended.

18 That the Forts of Newhauen and Blackneſſe ſtanding in want of men and victuall, whereof he was informed, were ſuffered notwithſtanding ſtill to want, to the great incouragement of the French, and diſhonour of the Engliſh.

19 That hee had vntruly publiſhed, that the Lords at London minded to deſtroy the King, which he inſtantly deſired he would neuer forget, and to that end inſtigated many young Lords, whereby ſedition and diſcord was made among the Nobles.

20 Laſtly, that whereas the Lords aſſembled at London, onely to conſult vpon a charitable communication to be had with the Protector for his miſ-gouernment of the King and Realme, hee contrariwiſe ſent Letters of credence to many places and perſons, that the ſaid Lords were no leſſe then high Traitors to the King, and great diſturbers of the whole Realme.

In which times of variable ſucceſſe, the King but a childe, the Nobles at variances, and the combuſtuous Commons obedient to neither, the French ſought to recouer the holds that the Engliſh had in their Countrey, and firſt by ſtealth meant to ſurprize the fortreſſe of Bulloignberg, vnto which enterprize ſeuen thouſand were choſen, vnder the conduct of Monſieur Chatillon.

The French intend to ſurprize Bulloigunberg.

(63) Theſe ſecretly marching in the night with ladders and furniture meete for the enterprize, approched within a quarter of a mile vnto Bulloignberg fort, amongſt whom was an Engliſh Souldier diſcharged out of their pay, for that he had taken a French woman to wife. This Carter, for ſo was his name, got entertainment vnder Chatillon, and now vnderſtanding whereabout they went, haſtily made from his Companie, and gaue the Alarum to his Country-men within the Fort; where Sir Nicholas Arnalt Captaine of the Peece, cauſed him to be drawne vp betwixt two Pikes to the height of the wall, vnto whom he declared the attempt in hand, and among them ſtood ſo valiantly in defence of the Fort, that hee gaue many a wound, and receiued ſome himſelfe: by him and this meanes the Peece was quit from ſurpriſall, and the ſlaughter of the French ſo great, that fifteene Waggons went laden away with dead Corpes.

A great ſlaughter of the French.

(64) This loſſe ſuſtained, and the Engliſh maſters in thoſe parts of their Maine, the French ſought to trie fortune for their Iles in the Seas, namely, Garneſey and Ierſey, poſſeſt and ſubject to King Edwards Crowne, their preparations were great, and their Marſhalliſts many; which notwithſtanding with ſuch loſſe were beaten backe from their bankes, as a thouſand men at Armes were ſlaine in the attempt, and the ſucceſſe ſo vnfortunate, as the French for feare of further diſcouragement, forbade the report, and made an inhibition, not to mention the expedition of that iourney.

The French aſſault the Iles of Garneſey and Ierſey.

(65) Neuertheleſſe, the French King ceaſed not his deſired purpoſes, till hee had got by ſurrender Hambletowne, Blackneſſe, Bulloignberg, and the Towne of Bulloigne it ſelfe, though bought at a deare rate, and deliuered with great griefe to the Engliſh; vnto ſuch a lamentable ſtate, and diſhonourable compoſition was the good King Edward brought, by the bandings of his great Councellors, and inſurrections of his vnruly Commons; after which calamities a great and mortall diſeaſe followed; namely, the ſweating ſickneſſe, that raged extremely thorow the Land, wherein dyed the two ſonnes of Charles Brandon, both of them Dukes of Suffolk, beſides an infinite number of men in their beſt ſtrengths, which followed onely Engliſhmen in forraine Countreys, no other people infected therewith, whereby they were both feared and ſhunned in all places where they came.

Bulloigunberg vpon compoſition deliuered to the French.

(66) And to fill vp the dolours of theſe dolefull times, the good Duke of Sommerſet was againe apprehended, euen when the leaſt ſuſpition was of any vndirect workings: for vpon his firſt releaſement, to linke a firme loue betwixt him and the potent Earle of Warwicke, his moſt malignant; a marriage was contracted betwixt the Lord Liſle his eldeſt ſonne and heire, and the Lady the Earles eldeſt daughter, which was ſolemnized with great joy at Sheene, in preſence of the young King; this amitie was outwardly carried with all faire ſhewes for a time, though inward hatred lay ſecretly hid, as by the ſequell incontinently appeared: for after a ſolemne creation of many Eſtates, wherein the Earle of Warwicke had his ſtyle raiſed to be Duke of Northumberland, (vnto whoſe rayes at that time moſt of the Courtiers caſt their eyes) the ſparkes of emulation began began presently to breake forth; where the simplicity of the one, gaue aduantage to the other, to compasse that which long had beene sought.

The Duke of Somerset priuily armed.

(67) The Duke of Somerset not well aduised, and yeelding too much vnto Sycophant flatteries, was put in feare of some sudden attempt intended against him, and therefore counselled to weare vnder his garment a coate of defence, which he accordingly did, and being so armed, came vnto the Councell Table, supposing no man had knowne of any such thing; but his bosome being opened, and the Armour perceiued, he was forthwith apprehended, as intending the death of some Councellor, and by Northumberland so vehemently taxed (who in Councell was euer the principall man) that he was forthwith attached, and sent to the Tower, vpon the sixteenth of October, with the Lord Grey of Wilton, Sir Michael Stanhop, Sir Thomas Arundel, Sir Ralph Vane, and Sir Miles Partridge, and the next day the Dutchesse his wife was likewise committed; all of them for suspition of Treason and fellony; and hee standing so indited, vpon the * second of December following, was arraigned at Westminster, attended with the Axe of the Tower, Billes, Halberds, and Pollaxes a great number.

Rich. Grafton.

The Duke of Somerset sent to the Tower. Stow. An. Dom. 1551.

* Stow saith, the first.

(68) His inditement was for Treason and fellony, and the same vrged vnto extremity, with many amplifications, and bitter inuectiues, especially that hee had sought and pretended the deaths of the Duke of Northumberland, the Lord Marquesse, and Pembrooke: where, after many milde answers to these matters obiected, he put himselfe to be tried by his Peeres, who acquitted him of treason, but found the inditement of fellony: when presently the Axe was commanded away, whereat the shout of the people shewed the great affection that was borne to the Duke: little mistrusting that the sentence of death was pronounced against him, or that the Kings Vncle should die as a fellon; neither did the Statute intend any such thing, as some are of opinion, but rather was purposely made for the suppression of rebellions, and vnlawfull assemblies, wherein such as should seeke or procure the death of any Councellor, should be guilty as in case of fellony. But such was the pleasure of the all-ordring power, that he which knew no theft, should die for that sinne; so that neither himselfe, nor his wisest Councellors, demanded the benefit of his Clergy, which would haue saued his life, if it had beene required.

The Duke of Somerset's inditement.

The Duke condemned of fellony.

(69) His sentence thus pronounced, he was againe sent backe to the Tower, wherein he kept a very sad Christmas, yea, and that in the Court, inclined to little mirth, (the King lamenting the condemnation of his Vncle) had not some witty disports broke off his passions, which how, and by whom they proceeded, let others report, and vs continue the Tragedy of this Duke; who vpon the two and twenty of February following, being Friday, was brought to the Scaffold vpon Tower-hill, by eight in the morning, where turning himselfe towards the East, he spake to the people, as followeth.

Rich. Graf. Iohn Stow. Holinsh.

(70) Dearely beloued friends, I am brought hither to suffer death, albeit I neuer offended against the King, neither in word nor deed, and haue alwayes beene as faithfull and true vnto this Realme, as any man hath beene: but forasmuch as I am by law condemned to die, I doe acknowledge my selfe as well as others to be subiect thereunto: wherefore to testifie mine obedience which I owe to the lawes, I am come hither to suffer death, whereunto I willingly offer my selfe, with most hearty thankes vnto God, that hath giuen me this time of repentance, who might through sudden death haue taken away my life, that I neither should haue acknowledged him, nor my selfe.

The Duke of Somerset's speech at his death.

(71) These wordes vttered, besides others exhortatory, that the people would continue constant in the Gospell, suddenly was heard a great noyse, whereby the assembly was strucke into great feare, some thinking that a storme or tempest descended from aboue, some supposed that the barrels of Gunpowder in the Armory had taken fire, and were all blowne vp into the Ayre, others thought that they heard a noyse of Horses prepared to battell, some againe affirmed confidently, that it did thunder, and others thought verily it was an earth-quake, and that the ground moued: vnto such confusion and terrour were they presently brought, wch (saith Stow) was none other, but that certaine men from the Hamlets warned with weapons to guard the Tower-hill, came thither somewhat after the houre appointed, whose formost seeing the Prisoner on the Scaffold, began to runne forward themselues, and call to their fellowes to come away: which word away, sounding as an Eccho in the peoples eares, they thought that reſcue had come to the Duke to take him away: and ſeeing the Bill-men to make forward ſo faſt, began themſelues to ſhrinke backe from the hill, euery man ſeeking to ſaue one, and by this accident and confuſed cries, this feare among them fell and beganne. This ſtirre ſcarce ended, another enſued by the running of the people towards the Scaffold, who ſeeing Sir Anthony Browne riding thitherward, ſuppoſed a pardon had come from the King, ſo that a ſudden ſhout aroſe, A pardon, a pardon, God ſaue the King; by which it onely appeared in what loue he was had, and how much his life was deſired of the Commons.

A great feare without any cause.

Iohn Stow in Annales.

The Duke entirely beloued of the Commons.

(72) The Duke, whoſe minde being altogether prepared for death, was little mooued either to hope or feare, and thereupon addreſſed his ſecond ſpeech to the people, and with no deiected countenance ſpake againe and ſaid: Beloued friends, there is no ſuch matter intended as you vainely hope and beleeue: It ſeemeth thus good to the Almighty, vnto whoſe ordinance it is meete that we all be obedient: wherefore I pray you be quiet and without tumult, for I am quiet, and let vs ſo joyne in prayer vnto the Lord, for the preſeruation of our Noble King, vnto whoſe Majeſty I wiſh continuall health, with all felicitie and abundance of proſperous ſucceſſe. Moreouer, I wiſh to his Councellors the grace and fauour of God, whereby they may rule all things vprightly with Iuſtice, vnto whom I exhort you all in the Lord, to ſhew your ſelues obedient, the which is alſo very neceſſary for you, vnder paine of condemnation, and alſo moſt profitable for the preſeruation of the Kings Majeſtie. And thereupon asking euery man forgiueneſſe, freely forgaue euery man againſt him, and deſiring the people to be quiet, leſt the fleſh ſhould be troubled, though his ſpirit was willing, hee meekely laid downe his head to the Axe, and receiued at one ſtroke his reſt by death.

The Dukes ſecond ſpeech vpon the Scaffold.

The Duke of Somerſet ſoone miſt, and ſore lamented.

(73) Howſoeuer this Dukes cauſe was ballanced by law, and hee taken away that ſtood betwixt ſome and their Sunne; yet was his death heauily diſgeſted by the people, that ſpake very bitterly againſt the Duke of Northumberland; but moſt eſpecially the young King ſore mourned, and ſoone miſſed the life of his Protector thus vnexpectedly taken away, who now depriued of both his Vncles, howſoeuer the times were paſſed with paſtimes, playes, and ſhewes, to driue away dumpes, yet euer the remembrances of them ſate ſo neere vnto his heart, that laſtly he fell ſicke of a Cough, which grieuouſly increaſing, ended with a conſumption of the Lungs.

King Edward falleth ſicke.

(74) His ſickneſſe continuing with great doubt of his life, vpon purpoſe, ſaith Grafton, to alter the ſucceſſion of the Crowne, three marriages were in one day ſolemnized, whereof the firſt was betwixt the Lord Gilford Dudley, fourth ſonne to the Duke of Northumberland, and the Lady Iane, eldeſt daughter of Henry Duke of Suffolke: the ſecond was betwixt the Lord Herbert, ſon and heire to William Earle of Pembrooke, and the Lady Katherine, the younger daughter of the ſaid Duke of Suffolke, and the third was betweene Henry Lord Haſtings, ſon and heire of Francis Earle of Huntington, and Katherine the youngeſt daughter of the Duke of Northumberland, which tending (ſaith he) to the diſheriſon of the rightfull heires, they prooued nothing proſperous: for two of them were preſently made fruſtrate, the one by death, and the other by diuorce.

Three marriages entended to reuert the ſucceſſion.

(75) The policy eſtabliſhed, and languiſhing ſickneſſe of the King gaue way vnto ſuch, as ſought the euerſion of the State, and alienation of the Crowne: In whoſe eye no head was ſeene fitter for that faire Diademe, then was Gilfords Bride, Iane the elder daughter of Suffolke, whoſe mother, Lady Frances then liuing, was the daughter of Mary, the French Queen, the younger Siſter to King Henry the eighth, vnto whom King Edward ouerwrought in his weakeneſſe, ordained his Crowne by Will, at the ſuggeſtions of ſuch Politiques, as meant to diſherit two lawfull Princes, Mary and Elizabeth, and to impugne the Statute, in caſe prouided for the ſucceſſion of King Henry the eighth his Children: vnto which Will (O griefe to heare) ſubſcribed all the Kings Councell, moſt of the Nobility, the reuerend Biſhops, and all the Iudges of the Land, one only excepted, euen Sir Iames Halles Knight, a Iuſtice of the Common Pleas, vpright in Iudgement, and a fauourer of the Goſpell, he, I ſay, neuer would write or conſent to the diſheriting of the Lady Mary.

Sir Iames Halles refuſed to ſubſcribe to King Edwards Will.

(76) The King thus accompliſhing what his Statiſts had wrought, lay languiſhing in his faintneſſe: the end whereof could not bee expected but onely by death, and now being worne almoſt to to nothing (his laſt breath drawing to the limits of Nature) he lift vp his eyes with a prepared heart, and prayed as followeth:

King Edwards Prayer.

Lord God, deliuer me out of this miſerable and wretched life, and take me among thy Choſen: howbeit not my will, but thy will be done; Lord, I commit my ſpirit to thee: O Lord, thou knoweſt how happy it were for me to bee with thee: yet for thy Choſen ſake, if it be thy will, ſend mee life and health, that I may truly ſerue thee: O my Lord, bleſſe thy people, and ſaue thine inheritance: O Lord God, ſaue thy Choſen people of England. O my Lord God, defend this Realme from Papiſtrie, and maintaine thy true Religion, that I and my people may praiſe thy holy Name, for thy Sonne Ieſus Chriſts ſake.

So turning his face, and ſeeing ſome by him, ſaid; I thought you had not beene ſo nigh. Yes, ſaid Doctor Owen, we heard you ſpeake to your ſelfe; then ſaid the King, I was praying to God: O I am faint, Lord haue mercy vpon me, and receiue my ſpirit: and in ſo ſaying, gaue vp the Ghoſt, to the great loſſe of England, in whom they had conceiued moſt hopes.

The vertues of King Edward.

(77) His vertues were rare and many, exceeding moſt Princes; and vices ſo few, that none can be taxed with leſſe: very learned (according to his yeeres) he was in the Latine and Greeke tongues, the French, Spaniſh, and Italian, yea (and ſaith Hieronymus Cardanus) he was adorned with the skill of Logicke, naturall Philoſophy, and Muſicke, and for Aſtronomy (ſaith he) my ſelf had experience, whom he learnedly oppoſed of the cauſe & courſe of Comets: for Humanity, he is the very Image of Morality, and in Princely graue Maieſtie beſt beſeeming a King: briefly, he may well ſeeme to be a miracle in Nature: nor doe I ſpeake thus Rhetorically to amplifie things, or to make them more then truth is, for the truth is more then I doe vtter: and in this hee was moſt admirable, that he could tell and recite all the Ports, Hauens, and Creekes, not within his owne Realme onely, but alſo in Scotland, and likewiſe in France, what comming in there was, how the tide ſerued in euery of them, what burden of Ship, and what winde beſt ſerued the comming in into them.

The report of Hieronymus Cardanus, ex Fra.

His learning.

His Memory.

His Care.

(78) Of all his Nobles, Gentry, Iuſtices, and Magiſtrates, hee tooke ſpeciall name of their Hoſpitality, and religious conuerſations, and that which is beſt accepted of a Prince, he was very liberall, louing, mercifull, meeke, and gentle towards his people, and ſo farre from blood, as he euer fauoured and ſpared as much as might be the life of man, yea, euen of Rebels, as we haue ſeene; neither was he willing to put Heretikes to death, as in a certaine diſſertation had once with Maſter Cheeke it appeared: inſomuch that when Ioane Butcher ſhould be burned for her hereſie, all the Councell could not mooue him to ſet his hand to the warrant of her execution, vntill Doctor Cranmer his Godfather, Archbiſhop of Canterbury laboured to induce him, vnto whom he ſaid, What, my Lord, will you haue mee to ſend her quicke to hell? and taking the pen, vſed this ſpeach: I will lay all the charge hereof vpon Cranmer before God. Then how his hand had beene gotten for his Vncles death, is to be admired.

His Mercy.

(79) But his conſtancy vnto Chriſts Goſpell, with the abandoning of all ſuperſtition, was very admirable, one example among many wee will not let to declare. Lady Mary his ſiſter, through the ſuit of Charles the Emperor, made great meanes to haue Maſſe ſaid in her Houſe, & that to be done without all preiudice of law: the greatneſſe of her perſon being the immediate ſucceſſor, and the might of the Emperor in amity with England, mooued the Councell to giue their conſent to the ſuit; to forward which, Cranmer Archbiſhop of Canterbury, accompanied with Ridley Biſhop of London, were imployed from them to the King, who hearing their meſſage, gaue the replication ſo grounded vpon Scripture, as they gaue ouer to vrge more that way: but like Politicians alleaged the danger in breach of amity with the Emperour, to which the King anſwered, he would rather aduēture the hazard of his own life, then to grant that which was not agreeable to the truth. The Biſhops yet vrged him with the bonds of nature, and ſubmiſſiuely ſaid, they would haue no nay: the King ſeeing himſelfe ſo importunated, burſt into weeping, and ſobbingly deſired them to be content: whereat the teares ſo abundantly burſt from their eyes, as they departed his preſence not able to ſpeake. And for a further teſtimony of this yong Kings zeale, reade, if you pleaſe, a Letter ſent vnto his ſiſter the Princeſſe Lady Mary, out of the original.

King Edwards zeale to Chriſts Goſpell.

(80) Right deare, and right entirely beloued ſiſter, we greet you well, and let you know that it grieueth vs much to perceiue no amendment in you of that, which we for good

cauſe, your ſoules health, our conſcience, and common tranquillitie of our Realme haue ſo long deſired; aſſuring you, that our ſufferance hath more demonſtration of naturall loue, then contentation of our conſcience, and fore-ſight of our ſafety. Wherefore, although you giue vs occaſion as much almoſt as in you is, to diminiſh our naturall loue; yet be we loth to feele it decay, and meane not to be ſo careleſſe of you as we be prouoked. And therefore meaning your weale, and therewith ioyning a care not to bee found guilty in our owne conſcience to God, hauing cauſe to require forgiueneſſe, that we haue ſo long for reſpect of loue towards you, omitted our bounden duty, wee doe ſend at this preſent our right truſty, and right well-beloued Councellor, the Lord Rich, our Chancellor of England, our truſty and right well-beloued Councellor, Sir Anthony Wingfield Knight, Comptroler of our Houſhold, and Sir William Peter Knight, one of our two principall Secretaries, in meſſage to you touching the order of your houſe, willing you to giue them firme credit in thoſe things they ſhall ſay to you from vs, and doe there in our Name. Giuen vnder our Signet at the Caſtle of Windſor, the of in the fift yeere of our Raigne, 1552.

(81) The fruits of which Religion, this godly King ſhewed by his workes of compaſſion towards the poore, and that eſpecially vpon the foundation of Chriſts Hoſpitall, the late ſuppreſſed place of the Gray-Fryers in London, vpon occaſion as followeth. It chanced the reuerend Biſhop Doctor Ridley to preach before his Maieſty at Weſtminſter, wherein hee Chriſtian-like exhorted the rich to be mercifull vnto the poore, and to that end amplified the words of the Text againſt the mercileſſe rich, and the negligence of ſuch as were in great place. The Sermon ended, and the King ſet to dinner, he ſent to the Biſhop, commanding him not to depart the Court, before he knew his further pleaſure, and thereupon cauſing two Chaires to be ſet in the Gallery, all others auoided, hee compelled the Biſhop to ſit downe by his ſide, and in no wiſe would admit him to be vncouered.

Doctor Ridleyes Sermon before King Edward.

(82) Where entring conference, hee firſt gaue him hearty thankes for his Sermon, repeating vnto him the chiefe points thereof, and comming to his exhortation for the poore, hee then told him that he thought himſelfe firſt touched in the ſpeech; For ſaid he, My Lord, you ſpake to them in authority, whereof vnder God I am the chiefe, and muſt firſt make anſwer to him if I be negligent, and therefore I thinke you principally meant me: Gods commandement I know moſt expreſly inioyneth vs to haue compaſſion of his poore members, for whom we muſt make account; and truly my Lord, I am moſt willing to trauell that way, not doubting but that your long approoued learning and wiſedome, whoſe zeale is ſuch as wiſheth them helpe; but that alſo you had conference with others what is beſt herein to be done, which I am alſo deſirous to know, and therefore I pray ſay freely your minde.

The conference betwixt the King and Biſhop Ridley.

(83) The mooued vnto theſe pious conſiderations little looking for ſuch queſtions of the Prince, ſate a while ſilent, ouer-ioyed at his words, and laſtly, vnprepared of any preſent inſtructions, told the King that the Citizens of London were beſt able to direct the plot, whoſe great charitie, and well-ordered gouernment, beſides their daily charges, being ouer-burdened with poore, had ſufficient experience, and if it would pleaſe his Maieſty to direct his Letters vnto them himſelfe, he would bee very ready to further this godly reſolution ſo farre as his meanes might any wiſe extend: whereupon the King preſently commanded his Letters to be writ, and would not ſuffer the Biſhop to depart, before himſelfe had thereto ſet his hand and ſignet, deſiring him to deliuer the ſame to the Lord Major, and with him to conferre about this buſineſſe, which he wiſhed might be accompliſhed with all expedition.

King Edwards great care for the poore.

(84) The Biſhop as ready as the King was deſirous, poſted apace to the Lord Major of London, where deliuering the Letter, offered his aſſiſtance to forward the worke, and they together with ſome Aldermen, and twenty foure Commoners agreed vpon three degrees of the poore, and them diuided againe into nine.

King Edwards Letter deliuered to the Lord Major.

(85) The Booke thus drawne, and preſented to the King, he thereupon deſired to be accounted the chiefe Founder of their reliefe, and forth-with gaue vnto the Citie, Saint Bartholmewes Hoſpitall by Smith-field, and the Gray-Fryers Church neere adioyning, with all the reuenewes belonging thereto; his Princely houſe of Bridewell, anciently the Manſion of many Engliſh Kings, wherein alſo their Courts of Iuſtice had beene kept, and ſumptuouſly new built by King

The Kings great liberality for the poore in London.

King Henry the eighth for the receit of the Emperour, hee gaue to the Lord Major and Citizens to be a houſe of correction for lewd and diſſolute liuers, and to ſet on worke the idle and loitering vagabonds, for whoſe maintenance with the new re-edified Hoſpitall of Saint Thomas in Southwarke, hee gaue ſeuen hundred Markes by yeere out of the Rents of the Hoſpitall of Saint Iohn Baptiſt or Sauoy, with all the beds, bedding, and other furniture thereto belonging, whereby the poore thus diſtinguiſhed, were by his godly furtherance thus prouided for.

(86) The Kings charitable gifts confirmed by Charter, and a Petition exhibited for liberty to take in Mortmaine of lands to a yeerely value without further licence, a place being left in the Patent to containe the ſumme, King Edward preſently called for penne and inke, and with his owne hand filled vp the ſpace with theſe words, foure thouſand Markes by yeere: which done, he burſt foorth and ſaid, Lord God, I yeeld thee moſt heartie thanks, that thou haſt giuen me life thus long to finiſh this worke to the glory of thy name.

(87) Now as this godly King was carefull in redeeming the time, ſo likewiſe to take as it were an account of himſelfe, he kept a iournall booke or Record written with his owne hand, how all things proceeded with him, and with the State, euen from the firſt day of his Raigne vnto his death: whoſe many vertues as they were inferior to none of his worthy Progenitors, and zeale little ſhort to the beſt Kings of Iudah, ſo was he ſoone miſt of all his loyall Subiects, when the boſome of Gods Saints was opened to the perſecutors ſwords.

(89) He died at Greenwich vpon Thurſday the ſixt day of Iuly, the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus, one thouſand fiue hundred fifty three, and the ſeuenteenth of his age, when hee had raigned ſixe yeeres, fiue moneths, and nine daies, and was buried vpon the ninth of Auguſt following, in the Chappell of Saint Peters Church at Weſtminſter, neere vnto his Grandfather King Henry the ſeuenth.

CHAPTER XXIII.

KING EDVVARDS life ended by his lingring diſeaſe, and the States-men intending to eſtabliſh his will; for the ſpace of two dayes his death was kept ſecret, and much conſultation among the Nobilitie had of the buſineſſe; all of them affecting the election of Iane, leſt Mary ſhould vndoe what Edward had done; to ſupport which purpoſe, many proiects were caſt, and many opinions giuen how to proceed, yet all ioyntly light in this point, That London was the hand which must

The Lord Major and Citizens ſworne to Lady Iane.

(2) Theſe comming to the Court, were ſecretly certified of King Edward his death, where his Will was declared, and Letters Patents ſhewed for the diſinheriting of his two ſiſters, and the raiſing of Suffolkes daughter vnto the Crowne; whoſe Religion was ſo zealous, and vertues ſo many (as in truth no Princeſſe was poſſeſſed with more) were ſo well ſet forth by theſe graue Councellors, that the Lord Major and Citizens tooke their oathes for Lady Iane, vnto whoſe obedience they promiſed to ſecure the City.

Iane proclaimed Queene.

An. Dom. 1553. Iuly 10.

(6) The Lords at London to ſet their enterprize vpon foot, by proclamation made knowne in moſt parts of the Citie, the death of King Edward, and that by Will hee had bequeathed his Crowne and and Dominions to the vertuous great Princeſſe, Lady Iane, daughter to Henry Duke of Suffolke (as we haue ſaid) and ſo was ſhee proclaimed by the name of Queene Iane, though many of the Commons wiſhed it had beene Queene Mary; and for ſome words ſpoken to that purpoſe, one Gilbert Pot a ſeruant Vintner, vpon the Pillory loſt both his eares. Vnto the aide of Lady Mary came the Earles of Suſſex, Bath, & Oxford, the Lord Wentworth, Sir Thomas Cornwallis, Sir Henry Iernigham, Sir William Walgraue, with diuers others of Norfolke & Suffolke, yea and the Citizens of Norwich themſelues, hauing certaine knowledge of King Edwards death, forthwith proclaimed Mary for Queene, and preſently ſent her aide both of men and munition. The Lords then hearing of great preparations, meant by times to ouer-match her in power, and thereupon agreed that Henry Duke of Suffolke their new Queenes Father ſhould with an Army repaire into Norfolke; which thing was ſo grieuous vnto Lady Iane his daughter, that with floods of teares ſhee obtained his ſtay.

Mary proclaimed Queene firſt in Norwich, Iuly 12.

(7) None then was held fitter to vndergoe this great buſineſſe, then was the Duke of Northumberland, young Gilfords Father, (who beſides his ſonnes dignity, vnto whom this new Queene was wife) his valiant parts and ſufficiency to marſhall an Army in Field, had beene often experienced in Scotland, and but lately among theſe people with whom he was now to deale. The Duke thus appointed, began, as it ſhould ſeeme, to miſtruſt the worſt, and thereupon freely vttered his minde to the Lords; willing them to be carefull at home, as he would be venturous abroad, for their cauſe was common, and all for the Queene. Hee with his (he ſaid) went now to venture their bodies to the bloody ſtrokes of warre, their Families and Children left to the diſpoſe of others, whom as he told them; if they meant not faire play, hee could auoid as well as any: thus much & more ſpoken to the like purpoſe, one of the Lords replied, and ſaid: Your Grace (as I iudge) doth caſt this doubt ouer farre: for which of vs all can waſh our hands cleane of this buſineſſe? and therefore it behoueth vs to be reſolute, as much as it doth you: and among them, Arundell wiſhed that he might goe with him.

(9) In the meane time the Lord Windſore, S^r. Edmund Peckham, Sir Robert Drurie, and Sir Edward Haſtings raiſed the Commons of Buckinghamſhire, proclaiming Queene Mary euer as they went: the like did S^r. Iohn Williams of Tame, and Sir Leonard Chamberlaine in Oxfordſhire, and ſo did Sir Thomas Treſham in the County of Northampton: theſe with many more made forward toward Norfolk, vnto whom many more ioyned in the way: and as God and good hap brought it to paſſe, ſixe tall Ships well manned, that were appointed before Yarmouth to haue taken Lady Mary, if ſhee had fled, were by foule weather driuen into the Hauen, where Maſter Iermingham was raiſing for her, and taking a Boat to hale them, the Sea-ſouldiers demanded what he would haue? His anſwer was, their Captaines: whereunto the Souldiers conſented, threatning to throw them into the Sea, if they refuſed to ſerue Queene Mary: the Ships thus gotten, and their number augmented, their terror grew fearefull to the Lords in the Tower: whoſe Tenants began then likewiſe to draw backe, and deny them their aide: ſo that certaine of them would faine haue beene gone, if by any meanes they could haue eſcaped the Tower, which the Lord Treaſurer aſſaied, but was brought backe againe about mid-night.

Councell commanded Doctor Ridley Bishop of London, to maintaine her cause in his Sermon made at Pauls Crosse, which he did vpon Sunday the sixteenth of July, but that neither working, nor the peoples affection drawne from the rightful Successor, the Lords fell from the Duke, who then was in Burie; and in London proclaimed Lady Marie Queene.

Queene Mary proclaimed in London, July. 19.

(11) This sudden alteration brought many sudden feares into the Dukes breast, whose onely way, as he well saw, was to follow the streame, and now returning to Cambridge, his Souldiers began to turne in affection, most of them forsaking his company, a few onely excepted, whose perils were deepely engaged with his, where, to shew his forwardnesse for the aduancement of Marie, wanting both Trumpet and Herald at hand, himselfe accompanied with the Major and the Marquesse of Northampton, in the Market place proclaimed her Queene: which done, in token of ioy hee threw vp his owne Cap. And thus the right reuerted to whom it belonged, wee will now addresse our stile to her dreadfull Raigne, wherin the Kingdomes story may seeme to be writ rather with blood then with inke, and the nursing mother, (as Queenes by the Prophet are termed and called) to forget the naturall affection due to her Subiects, which in some sort may bee compared to the children of her womb.

(12) Yet were her beginnings both milde and gentle, pardoning all offenders in case of Lady Iane; excepting the Duke of Northumberland, the only doer, and Sir Iohn Gates, Captaine of the Guard, who was in Armes against her; with some few others that worthily suffered for that offence. The Duke (as is said) laying downe weapon, & himselfe proclaiming Queene Marie, was neuertheless arrested with Francis Earle of Huntington in the Kings Colledge at Cambridge by a Sargeant at Armes, but letters being then sent from the Councell, that euery man should bee dismissed without further trouble, the Duke among them was also released.

(13) The next morning Henry Fitz-Alan Earle of Arundell, came into Cambridge from the Queene, who entring his Chamber, the Duke at his feet fell vpon his knees, desiring him for Gods loue to consider his case, that had done nothing without warrant of him & the Councel. My Lord, said Arundell, I am sent hither from the Queene to arrest you. And I, said the Duke, obey your arrest: yet I beseech your Lordship to vse mercy toward him, whose Acts haue bin no more then was enioyned by commission. That sooner should you haue sought for, said the Earle; and thereupon committed him to guard, and left him to the mercy of the Queene.

(14) The Duke then with his three Sons Iohn, Ambrose, and Henry, the Earle of Huntington, Sir Andrew Dudley, the two Gates, Iohn and Henry, Sir Thomas Palmer, and Doctor Sands; were conueied towards London, and brought to the Tower, where the Lord Gilford Dudley, and the Lady Iane his wife, from the high Title of Soueraignty were made subiect to deiected Prisoners miseries.

(15) Queene Marie from Fremingham repaired towards London, being all the way saluted without any mislikes, sauing that many men feared the altering of Religion: at her entrance into the Tower were released Thomas Duke of Norfolke, who had laine there from the last of King Henry the eighth, Edward Lord Courtney, whom shee forthwith aduanced Earle of Deuonshire, Cutbert Tunstall Bishop of Durham, and Stephen Gardiner late Bishop of Winchester, by her then made Lord Chancellor of England. From the Marshal-sea was freed Edmund Bonner Bishop of London, and now againe restored by the deposing of Doctor Ridley, who for his Sermon lately made, was committed to the Tower; so likewise Doctor Scorie gaue place vnto Day, in the Bishopricke of Chichester, Miles Couerdale vnto Wesie, in the Bishopricke of Excester, and Iohn Hooper vnto Heath, in the Bishopricke of Worcester, who forthwith was committed to the Fleet, and Archbishop Cranmer, into the Tower; so roughly shee began with the reformed Clergy, how milde soeuer her other proceedings were.

(16) Against which men, as also against all printed bookes, which any wise pointed towards the disgrace of the Papall See, (the tainture whereof had stucke in her owne breast euer since her infancie) Queene Mary set forth a Proclamation; and so much was she deuoted to that See of Rome, as being often mooued by King Edward, her brother, to imbrace the Gospell, according to Lawes in his time established, with promise of her aduancement, by matching her in Marriage with Don Lewis the brother of Portingall; her answer was, She had rather to forgo all earthly preferments, & to lose all her Lands,

(19) The next that felt the calamities of thoſe times, were the Lady Iane and the Lord Gilford Dudley her Husband, both innocent perſons in that which their Fathers had done: Shee doubtleſſe was a Lady of admirable gifts both in learning, religiõ, & humane knowledge, as by her conference with Fecknam, letters to an Apoſtata, exhortation to her Siſter, and prayers by her made in moſt feeling manner, doe euidently appeare, and that ſhee was conſtrained to conſent to the things done, is manifeſt by a letter ſent to her father a little before her death: wherein, after a holy and dutifull exhortation vnto patience, ſhee vſeth this Speech: My deare Father, (if I may without offence reioyce in mine owne miſſe-haps) me ſeemes in this I may account my ſelfe bleſſed, that waſhing my hands with the innocencie of my fact, my guiltleſſe blood may cry before the Lord, mercy, mercy to the innocent. And yet though I muſt acknowledge, that being conſtrained, and as you wot well enough, continually aſſailed, in taking vpon me, I ſeemed to conſent, and therin offended the Queene and her Lawes: yet doe I aſſuredly truſt, that this mine offence towards God, is much the leſſe, in that being in ſo royall eſtate as I was, mine inforced honour neuer agreed with mine innocent heart.

To preuent which, this Henry Duke of Suffolke, but lately pardoned of life, ſecretly departed vnto Leiceſter and Warwickeſhires, making Proclamations for the abandoning of ſtrangers, and inſtigated the people to withſtand the Queenes marriage agreed vpon with Philip.

(23) This (I say) seemed to haſten the death of thoſe innocents, whom their Fathers had doubly brought into danger; for the Statiſts of thoſe times, knowing their Queen could haue no quiet whileſt theſe great oppoſites were reared againſt her, held it beſt policy to take them away; whereupon, the twelft of February and firſt day of the weeke, Lord Gilford Dudley was had to the Scaffold vpon Tower Hill, and there with prayers and great penancy ended his life: whoſe body all bloody laid in a Cart together with the head wrapped in a cloth, was brought into the Chappell within the Tower, euen in the ſight of this ſorrowfull Lady: a ſpectacle more deadly then was the Axe of her death. And now her own part next to be acted, the Stage of her Tragedy was raiſed vpon the Green within the Tower, wheron being mounted, with a cheerefull countenance, and a patient minde, theſe words with great conſtancy ſhee ſpake at that preſent.

(28) Among many diſlikers of the Queenes marriage, it chanced, one, for ſome other offence, to be committed to the Fleet by the Councell, who being an inward acquaintance of Wyats, was ſuppoſed by him to haue reuealed the conſpiracie; whereupon he put himſelfe in action, before the enterprize was altogether ripe, and accompanied with Thomas Iſley, and others, at Maidſtone in Kent, publiſhed a Proclamation againſt the Queenes marriage, alleaging the thraldome whereunto the Land would become ſubiect, by that Spaniſh match: and frō Maidſtone accōpanied with Sr. George Harper, haſted to Rocheſter, where they forth-with brake downe the Bridge.

February 1.

(36) At whoſe approach ſo neere London, ſuch feares were poſſeſſed, that beſides thoſe in the Court (who inſtigated the Queene to remooue into the Tower) the Lord Major, Aldermen, and moſt of the Citizens were in Armour, and the Sergeants and Lawyers at Weſtminſter Hall pleaded their cauſes in Harneſſe, at which time it was no need to bid the Spaniſh Ambaſſadors be gone; who no more ſtanding to woo for their Maſter, made away by water as faſt as they could: and yet ſome comfort was conceiued by the certaine newes of the diſcomfiture of the Carewes and Gibs, that were making head in the Weſt, now wholly defeated, and fled: which was proclaimed in London vpon Candlemas Eue: vpon the day of that Feaſt, Queene Mary, to make the City ſure on her ſide, came vnto the Guild-hall, accompanied with many Courtiers, whither likewiſe were aſſembled the Lord Major, the Aldermen, and the chiefe Citizens in their Liueries: the Queene being placed, and all men attending her pleaſure, with very good grace and words well vttered, ſhee ſpake in effect as here inſueth.

Great feares among the people.

" (28) In my owne perſon I am come "vnto you, to tell you that, which your "ſelues already doe ſee and know, "I meane the traiterous and ſeditious "number of the Kentiſh Rebels, that "are aſſembled againſt vs and you. "Their pretence (as they ſay) is to reſiſt "a marriage betweene vs and the Prince "of Spaine, of all their plots, pretended "quarrels, and euill-contriued Articles, "you haue beene made priuy. Since "which time, our Councell haue reſor- "ted to the Rebels, demanding the "cauſe of their continued enterprize, "by whoſe anſwers the marriage is "found to be the leaſt of their quarrell: "or rather a cloake to couer their pre- "tenſed purpoſes againſt our Religion; "for, ſwaruing from their former Ar- "ticles, they now manifeſtly bewray the "inward Treaſon of their hearts, moſt "arrogantly demanding the poſſeſſion "of our Perſon, the keeping of our "Tower, and not onely the placing and "diſplacing of our Councellors: but al- "ſo to vſe them and vs at their plea- "ſures: what I am, louing Subjects, you "right well know, your Queene, to "whom at my Coronation, when I was "wedded to the Realme, and to the "Lawes of the ſame (the ſpouſall Ring "whereof I haue on my finger, which "neuer hitherto was, nor hereafter ſhall "be left off) ye promiſed your alleage- "ance, and obedience vnto mee. And "that I am the right, and true Inheritor "to the Engliſh Crowne, I not onely "take all Chriſtendome to witneſſe, but "alſo your Acts of Parliaments confir- "ming the ſame. My Father (as you all "know) poſſeſſed the Regall eſtate by "right of inheritance, which now by the "ſame right is diſcended vnto mee: to "him you alwayes ſhewed your ſelues "both faithfull and louing Subjects, as "to your Liege Lord and King, and "therefore I doubt not but you will "ſhew your ſelues ſo to me his Daugh- "ter; which if you doe, then may you "not ſuffer any Rebell to vſurpe the "Gouernment of our Perſon, or inter- "poſe our eſtate, eſpecially ſo preſump- "tuous a Traytor as this Wyat hath "ſhewed himſelfe to be: who moſt cer- "tainly, as he hath abuſed our ignorant

"colour of the ſame, to ſubdue the lawes
"to his will, and to giue ſcope to the raſ-
"call and forlorne perſons, to make ge-
"nerall hauock & ſpoile of your goods.
"And this I ſay further vnto you in the "word of a Prince, I cannot tell how na"turally a Mother loueth her Children,
"for I was neuer the Mother of any; but "certainly if a Prince & Gouernor may "as naturally loue the Subjects, as the "mother doth her child, then aſſure your
"ſelues, that I being your Soueraigne "Lady, and Queene, doe as earneſtly and "tenderly loue and fauour you. And I
"thus louing you, cannot but thinke, that "you as heartily and faithfully loue me
"againe: and ſo this loue bound together "in the knot of concord, we ſhalbe able,
"I doubt not, to giue theſe Rebels a ſhort
"and ſpeedy ouerthrow. Now as con"cerning my intended marriage, you
"ſhall vnderſtand, that I entred not into
"the treaty thereof, without the aduice
"of our Priuy Councell, yea, & by aſſent
"of thoſe, to whom my Father commit"ted his truſt, who haue ſo conſidered
"the great commodities that may therof
"enſue, as they not onely haue thought
"it very honourable, but alſo expedient
"both for the Wealth of our Realme, &
"alſo of our louing Subjects. But as tou"ching my ſelfe (I aſſure you) I am not
"ſo deſirous of wedding, neither am ſo
"preciſely wedded to my wil, that either
"for mine owne pleaſure I will chuſe
"where I liſt, or elſe ſo amorous, as needs
"I muſt haue one: for I thanke God (to "whom be the praiſe) I haue hitherto li-
"ued a Virgin, and doubt not but with "Gods grace to be able to liue ſo ſtill.
"But if (as my Progenitors haue done "before) it might pleaſe God that I "might leaue ſome fruit of my body to "be your Gouernour, I truſt you would "not onely reioyce thereat, but alſo I "know it would be to your great com-

"or thinke, that this marriage ſhould ei"ther turne to the danger, or loſſe of any "of you my louing Subiects, or to the "detriment of any part of the Royall E"ſtate of this Engliſh Realme, I would ne"uer conſent thereunto, neither would I
"euer marry whileſt I liued. And in the "word of a Queene, I promiſe and aſſure
"you, that if it ſhall not probably ap-
"peare before the Nobilitie and Com"mons in the high Court of Parliament,
"that this marriage ſhall be for the ſin-
"gular benefit and commoditie of the "whole Realme; that then I will abſtaine
"not only from this marriage, but alſo
"from any other. Wherefore good Sub"iects, plucke vp your hearts, and like
"true men ſtand faſt with your lawfull
"Prince againſt theſe Rebels, both ours
"and yours, and feare them not, for (I aſ"ſure you) I doe not: and will leaue with
"you my Lord Howard, and my Lord
"Treaſurer, to be aſſiſtant with my Lord
"Major, for the ſafegard of the Citie frō
"ſpoile and ſackage, which is the onely
"ſcope of this rebellious Company.

(37) The Oration ended, and the Citizens well pleaſed, Q. Mary with good content returned to the Court, where conferring with her Councell, ſhe ordained the L. William Herbert, Earle of Pembrooke, Generall of the Field, and gaue forth Proclamatiō, that whoſoeuer could bring Wyat either quicke or dead, ſhould be rewarded with 100. pound Land by yeere, to him and his poſterity for euer.

The Earle of Pembrooke made Lord Generall. Rich. Grafton.

(38) Wyat in Depford, & knowing what was done, with foureteene Enſignes, and foure thouſand ſtrong, vpon Saturday the third of February, marched towards Londō, at whoſe approch, the White Tower hauing him in danger, ſhot off her Ordnance, but did miſſe their marke, ſome leuelling too farre ouer, and ſome as much too ſhort. His entrance into Southwarke was peaceable, & without all reſiſtance, though many Country-men were therein beſtowed to with-ſtand his comming, who contrary to truſt, joyned with the Kentiſh, and then to winne the hearts of the people, he preſently made Proclamation, that no Souldier ſhould take away any thing without due paiment, and the parties conſent: notwithſtanding Wincheſter Houſe ſoone felt the cōtrary, whoſe goods were ranſacked, the Bookes in the Library cut and defaced, and not a locke left vpon the doores: ſuch ſpoiles inſurrections euer aime at, how faire ſoeuer they foyle the glaſſe to the ſight.

(39) The Suburbs thus his, he aſſured himſelfe the City likewiſe ſhortly would be, but comming to the Bridge, he found the Gates faſt ſhut, neither any in haſt to open them for him, therefore making a trench at the Bridge-foote, planted two Peeces of Ordnance againſt the Gate: At S^t. Georges Church he mounted another, the fourth at the entrance into Barmondſey-ſtreete, and the fift towards the Biſhop of Wincheſters Houſe.

(40) Within the City the Lord Major, and Lord William Howard, cauſed the Draw-bridge to be cut down, & making fortifications for their defence, placed great Ordnance againſt the entrance. Wyat ſtill thirſting to know the Cities intent, got with ſome few followers thorow the Porters lodge vnto the Draw-bridge, where being vnſeene himſelfe, ſaw the paſſage too difficult to haue friendly acceſſe, and thereupon ſaid to his conſorts, This place is too hot for vs. Beſides, the Tower began to be topped with Ordnance, ſeuen Culuerings and Demy Cannons leuelled againſt the Bridge-foote, the Steeples of S^t. Olaues, and S^t. Marie Oueries; all the White Tower laden with her Peeces, three Fawconers ouer the water-Gate, & a double Culuering vpon Diuelling Tower: and all theſe were turned and fearefully charged vpon the Borough of Southwarke: which ſeene, the Inhabitants with great lamentations came vnto Wyat, and complained, that for his cauſe they were like to be vtterly vndone; who ſtrucken with pitty and remorſe of ſo many, preſently remoued his Army towards Kingſton vpon Thames, where finding the Bridge broken downe, with Ladders and Planks he ſoone repaired it, and ſo paſſing the Riuer the ſame night, came to Braineford before he was deſcried by the Queens Scouts; the newes whereof ſore troubled the Court. Wyats hopes were to haue ſurprized the Citie vpon the ſudden, & therefore made ſuch haſte as he did, but being hindred by a Peece of great Ordnance, that was diſmounted from the carriage, came not vnto Knights-bridge before it was day.

(41) In the ſame morning the Earle of Pembrook, Lord Generall, had taken S. Iames Fields, whither Wyat and his in good order marched, but ſeeing the way fore-laid both with foote and horſe-men, turned downe the old Lane directly towards S^t. Iames, whence Captaine Vaughan with two Enſignes tooke towards Weſtminſter, and Wyat along the Cauſey leading to Charing Croſſe, the Lord Generals Horſemen, hitherto ſtood houering aloofe, vntil the enemy was paſſed, all but the taile, vpon which they violently ſet, and ſeuered from the reſt, the maine neuer looking backe to releeue their diſtreſſe.

February 7. The Queenes Army in Saint Iames field.

(42) From the higher ground, and along the high way, the great Ordnance played, and Wyats againe anſwered the like, though with ſmall hurt to either, onely one from the Hill ſlew three of Wyats men in a ranke, and ſtrucke thorow the Bricke-wall into the Parke. Wyat paſſing forward by the battell of foot-men, without any impeachment, came to Charing-Croſſe, where the Lord Chamberlaine, and S^r. Iohn Gage, ſtood ready to reſiſt him: but the Kentiſh Souldiers ruſhing violently into the ſtreets, forced them into the gates of White-Hall, which preſently were ſhut, & a report in the Court that the Lord Generall was reuolted to Wyat; all ſo diſtracted, that none durſt truſt others, and no other voice therein heard, but Treaſon, Treaſon. Meane while Wyat, with ſuch ſmall company as he had, haſted thorow Fleet-ſtreete, and came vnto Ludgate, where he knocked to haue entrance, and well hoped of further aſſiſtance, but was farre deceiued, the gate being guarded againſt him, with a number of true Citizens, and Bands of the Queenes friends.

Wyat commeth to Ludgate.

(43) But thoſe ſtraglers that had taken into Weſtminſter, whereof Kneuet was Captaine, ſeeking to recouer their companions, came before the Court gates, and there made their ſtand, which being ſhut againſt them, ſhot many of their arrowes into the Garden, yea, and into the windowes of White-hall, though without any hurt: from the Court thus guarded againſt them, they forth-with departed, meaning to follow Wyat their Leader into London, and marching forward, were met with at Charing-Croſſe, by Sir Henry Iernigham, Captaine of the Guard, Sir Edward Bray Maſter of the Ordnance, and Sir Philip Paris Knights, ſent thither by order of the Lord Generall, with a Band of Archers, and certaine Field Peeces to ſecure the Court; their Artillery diſcharged, they preſently joyne fight with the Rebels at puſh of the Pike, who a while ſtucke to it manfully; in which conflict was the triall of the day: but as their quarrell was trayterous, ſo their hearts were ſoone quelled, each one ſauing himſelfe by flight, wherein about twentie of thoſe bemired Souldiers were ſlaine, and no other cry heard, but, Downe with the Draggle-trailes.

The conflict at Charing-Croſſe.

(44) Wyat returned from Ludgate, ſate downe vpon a ſtall againſt the common Inne called Bell-Sauage, where he began (as it ſhould ſeeme) to expoſtulate what his heady raſhneſſe had done, and the vaine hopes hee had conceiued of the Citizens abetments, who ſeldome take part againſt the Crowne: hee then deſpairing of further ſucceſſe, retiretired backe towards the Court, and was not ſtayed vntill he came to Temple-Barre, where certaine Horſemen comming from the Field, met him full in the face, betwixt whom began ſome bickering, till laſtly Clarentius, King at Armes, came to him, and ſaid; Maſter Wyat, you ſee the day is gone againſt you, and in reſiſting, you can doe no good, but hazard the death of your Souldiers, and your ſelfe, to the great perill of your ſoule. My counſell is, that you were beſt to yeeld, and perchance you may finde the Queene mercifull, if you ſtay from further blood-ſhed.

(45) Wyat hereat ſomewhat aſtonied, ſeeing now his whole deſignes defeated (though his few Souldiers were bent ſtill to fight) anſwered the Herauld, Well then, If I muſt needs yeeld, I will yeeld to a Gentleman: to whom Sir Maurice Barkley came preſently, and bade him mount his Horſe behind, in like manner another tooke vp Sr. Thomas Cobham, and the third Thomas Kneuet, and ſo carried them vnto the Court, whence in the afternoone, they with the two Mantels, and Alexander Bret, were committed to the Tower, Sir Thomas Wyat wearing a ſhirt of Male vnder a veluet Caſſocke, and the wind-lace of his Dagge hanging about his necke. The next day eleuen Gentlemen more of name and account, were likewiſe committed to the Tower. In London about fifty perſons were hanged for Wyats conſpiracie, and foure hundred more led thorow the City with halters about their neckes to Weſtminſter, where in the Tilt-yard they were all pardoned by the Queene, pronouncing her mercy from the Gallery aboue.

(46) But the Capitall offender Sir Thomas Wyat arraigned at Weſtminſter vpon caſe of high Treaſon, confeſſed the inditement, and had judgement of death accordingly, which he ſuffered vpon the Scaffold on Tower-hill, the eleuenth of April following: his words to the people were theſe; "Good people, I am come "hither preſently to die, being thereto "lawfully and worthily condemned, for "I haue ſore offended againſt God and "the Queenes Majeſtie; I truſt God hath "forgiuen me, and will take mercy vpon "me; I beſeech the Queenes Majeſtie "alſo of forgiueneſſe: (ſhe hath forgiuen "you quoth Doctor Weſton) let euery "man beware how he taketh any thing "in hand againſt the higher Powers; vn-"leſſe God be proſperable to his pur-"poſe, it will neuer take good effect or "ſucceſſe, whereof you may now learne "by me, and I pray God I may be the "laſt example in this place. But where it "is ſaid, and noyſed abroad, that I ſhould "accuſe the Lady Elizabeth and the Lord "Courtney, it is not ſo, good people: For "I aſſure you, neither they, nor any o-"ther now yonder in hold, was priuy to "my riſing before I began, as I haue de-"clared no leſſe to the Queenes Coun-"cell, and that is moſt true. Then ſaid Doctor Weſton, Marke here, my maſters, hee ſaith that that, which he hath ſhewed to the Councell in writing of them, is moſt true. Whereupon Wyat put off his Gowne, his doublet, and waſt-coate, and knitting a kercheefe ouer his eyes, with moſt feruent prayers, receiued the ſtroke of the Axe.

(47) Alexander Bret, and twenty two Kentiſh perſons beſides, were executed in diuers parts of that County: others were likewiſe arraigned for the ſame Conſpiracie, as Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, and Sir Iames Croft, the one quit by his Inqueſt, the other pardoned of life by the Queene. Many others were ſuſpected as ayders vnto Wyat, and his enterprize, among whom the Lord Courtney, and the Princeſſe Elizabeth, Siſter to the Queene, were not the leaſt, and therefore both of them committed to the Tower: of which Ladies troubles, innoceny, and truth, thus we finde related:

Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, and Sir Iames Croft arraigned.

Lady Elizabeths troubles.

(48) Theſe Virgin Princes were not ſo neerely linked in blood and nature, as they were ſeparated aſunder in affecting Religion, and that being the prime cauſe for which theſe commotions were raiſed, Queene Mary much ſuſpected her Siſter to be a principall moouer therein. The iealouſie whereof, Gardiner of Wincheſter did further inflame, by blowing Conjectures into her eare: ſo that needs the Princeſſe muſt be ſent for, then lying ſicke at her Mannor of Aſhridge, euen the next day after that Wyat roſe. The meſſengers were, Sir Iohn Williams, Sir Edward Haſtings, and Sir Thomas Cornwallis, all three Priuy Councellors, with a troope of Horſemen, in number two hundred and fifty.

Lady Elizabeth ſore ſicke, is ſent for.

M. Foxe Act. and Mon. 1288.

(49) Theſe comming to Aſhridge at ten in the night, ſuddenly aſcended into her Priuy Chamber, and making it knowne they came from the Queene, had preſent acceſſe into her Bed-Chamber; where the ſaid Lady lay very ſore ſicke: their firſt ſalutations were, that they were were ſorry to ſee her in that eſtate. And I am not glad, ſaid ſhee, to ſee you here at this time of the night. Madam, quoth they, our Meſſage requires haſte, and the Queenes pleaſure is, that you ſhall be at London the ſeuenth of this moneth. No Creature gladder to come to her Majeſtie then I (ſaid Lady Elizabeth) being right ſorry that I am not in caſe at this time to attend her Grace, as your ſelues here ſee. Indeed (ſaid they) for that we ſee, we are heartily ſorry, but our Commiſſion is, that we bring you to London either quick or dead. Whereat ſhe being greatly amazed, ſorrowfully ſaid, ſhee well hoped their Commiſſion was nothing ſo ſtrait: but they calling for two Doctors of Phyſicke, demanded whether ſhee might be remooued with life: and that being reſolued, bade her prepare againſt the next morning, and ſo left this innocent Princeſſe very ſore perplexed the reſt of the night.

Lady Elizabeth as a Priſoner conueyed to the Court.

(50) The next morning approched, and ſhe in no better plight, notwithſtanding was led forth more like a Priſoner then a Prince, which the people in euery place as ſhe paſſed, did much lament, and ſtrongly guarded, was ſo conueyed vnto the Court, where for foureteene dayes ſpace, ſhe comfortleſſe continued without ſight of friend, the Queene or any Lords, thoſe onely excepted that attended the doores, which were the Lord Chamberlaine, and Sir Iohn Gage.

Princeſſe Elizabeth examined of Treaſon.

(51) Vpon Friday before Palme Sunday, Gardiner of Wincheſter, & nine more of the Councell, came into her preſence, and there charged her both with Wyats Conſpiracy, and the ſtirres lately made in the Weſt parts, by Sr. Peter Carew, and others, which ſhe moſt conſtantly denyed: but in concluſion, they told her, it was the Queenes pleaſure, that ſhee ſhould forth-with goe to the Tower: the name of which dolefull priſon, ſtrucke deepe to her heart. I truſt (ſaid ſhe) her Majeſtie will be far more gracious, then to commit to that place, a true and moſt innocent woman, that neuer had offended her in thought, word, nor deed. And thereupon inſtantly deſired thoſe Lords to be a meane for her vnto the Queene: which ſome of them promiſed, and much pittied her caſe. But about an houre after, came foure of theſe Lords againe, namely, Wincheſter, the Treaſurer, the Steward, & Suſſex: with a charge to diſcharge her of all attendants ſauing only her Gentleman Vſher, three Gentlewomen, and two Groomes of her Chamber: the Guard was ſet to ward in the next roomes; two Lords with bands of men to watch in the Hall, and two hundred Northerne white Coates in the Garden: thus all was made ſure, and ſhee kept from ſtarting.

(52) The next day came vnto her two Lords of the Councell, with commandment from the Queene to haue her to the Tower: they roundly told her, her Barge was prepared, and that the Tyde would tarry for no body. This heauy newes increaſed this diſtreſſed Ladies penſiueneſſe, who in moſt humble wiſe became Petitioner vnto their Lordſhips, that ſhe might ſtay vntill the next Tide, which as ſhe well hoped, would proue more comfortable; but the one of them being more forward in his Commiſſion then the other, flatly told her, that neither Tide nor Time ſhould bee delayed. Whereupon her Grace deſired ſhee might write to the Queene. He againe anſwered, that he durſt not ſuffer it, neither in his judgement was it conuenient: but the other more milder (which was the Earle of Suſſex) kneeling downe, told her, that her Grace ſhould haue liberty to write her minde: ſwearing as he was a true man, himſelf would deliuer it into the Queens hand, and bring her the anſwer, whatſoeuer came of it: which honourable permiſſion was then moſt thankfully taken, and afterward moſt highly eſteemed in her Princely fauours towards that honourable man; but in writing this Letter or Petition to the Queene, the Tide was turned, and ſerued not to ſhoote the Bridge with a Barge; therefore it was priuily determined, to take the aduantage of the next, which with better aduiſement was againe deferred, for that it fell about mid-night, whence roſe a feare, that ſhee might be forceably taken from them before ſhee came to the Tower: and ſo with great prouidence was that danger preuented.

The honourable parts of the Earle of Suſſex.

(53) The next day being Palme Sunday, ſerued well for their purpoſe, when as vnder pretext of deuotion, the Citizens of London were commanded to carry their Palmes to the Church, whileſt her Barge might be paſſed by without ſight, or any ſuſpect. And to that purpoſe, the foreſaid two Noblemen, about nine of the Clocke repaired vnto her, ſhewing that the time was now come, that her Grace muſt goe to the Tower. To which ſhe anſwered, The Lords will be done, I am contented: ſeeing it is the Queenes Lady Elizabeth carried Priſoner vnto the Tower.

Queenes minde: and comming into the Garden to take Barge, ſhee caſt her eyes towards euery Window, hoping to ſee ſome that would pitty her caſe: but that alſo failing, ſhe ſighed, and ſaid; I maruell what the Nobilitie meane, to ſuffer mee a Prince to be led into Captiuitie, the Lord knowes whither, for my ſelfe doe not.

(54) Great haſte was made to the Barge, and as much to get by London vnſeene: but the Tyde young, and not fully come in, the fall of the water at the Bridge was ſo great, as the Bargemen themſelues feared to paſſe thereunder, and motioned a ſtay, till the ſtreame were more leuell, which in no wiſe would be heard: whereupon they paſſed the Arch with ſuch danger, as the ſterne of the Boate ſtrucke againſt the ground; and come to the ſtaires, could not take land without ſtepping into the water, which this tender, and newly recouered Princeſſe was forced to doe, in which paſſage ſhee vttered theſe words: I ſpeake before thee, O God, hauing none other friend but thee onely, here landeth as true a ſubiect, beeing priſoner, as euer landed at theſe ſtaires; to which the ſeuerall Lords anſwerd, If it were ſo, it was the better for her. Shee come into the gate, a great number of Seruants and Warders of the Tower ſtood to guard her, through whom as ſhe paſſed, the poore men kneeling downe, with one voyce, deſired God to preſerue her Grace, whereof ſome were rebuked, and others put from their Ordinary the next day.

(55) Then paſſing ſomewhat further, both faint and vncomfortable, ſhe reſted her ſelfe vpon a cold ſtone, to whom M. Bridges, the Lieutenant then being, ſaid; Madam, you were beſt to come out of the rain, for you ſit vnwholſomely; to whom ſhee replyed, Better ſit here, then in a worſe place; for God knoweth, and not I, whither you will bring me: At which her ſorrowfull and dejected anſwer, her Gentleman Vſher, a ſeruant moſt loyall and louing to his Miſtreſſe, among many others brake forth into floods of teares, the witneſſes commonly of all inward griefe: which the Princeſſe perceiuing, reprooued, demanding what he meant, ſo to diſcourage her, ſeeing ſhe tooke him to bee her Comforter, and eſpecially knowing her truth to be ſuch, as that no man ſhould haue any cauſe to weepe for her?

The conſtant patience of Lady Elizabeth.

The Earle of Suſſex moſt firme for Lady Elizabeth.

(57) Two dayes ſpent thus in the Tower, and Gods diuine ſeruice celebrated in Engliſh, it was commanded to haue Maſſe in her lodgings; & to that end two of her Yeomen were appointed to anſwer the Prieſt, which was as vnwillingly done, as the deuotion was ſmall. Then were the fauourites examined, yea, and * ſome of them with torture, and all to finde a fit knife to cut her innocent throat, that ſo Wincheſter might waſh his white Rochet in her purple blood; who being Lord Chancellor, and Ruler of the reſt, came into the Tower to examine her himſelfe, with ſome others of the Queenes Councell: Shee then brought before them, was demanded of the talke ſhee had with Sir Iames Croft (a priſoner in the Tower, and then brought to her preſence) concerning her remooving from Aſhridge vnto Dunnington Caſtle. My Lords (ſaid ſhee) me thinkes you doe me wrong to examine euery meane Priſoner againſt me; if they haue done euill, let them anſwer for it, I pray you joyne mee not with ſuch offenders; as touching my remoone to Dunnington, mine officers, and you Sir Iames Croft can tell; but what is this to the purpoſe? might I not, my Lords, goe to mine owne houſes at all times? Whereunto the Lord of Arundell kneeling downe, anſwered that her Grace ſaid truth, and that himſelfe was ſorry to ſee her troubled about ſuch vaine matters. Well, my Lords (ſaid ſhe) you ſift mee narrowly, but you can doe no more then God hath appointed, vnto whom I pray to forgiue you all.

Lady Elizabeth commanded to haue Maſſe in her Lodgings.

* Edmund Tremaine.

Lady Elizabeth againe examined of Treaſon.

(58) No fault appearing, nor offence found, yet was ſhee ſtill retained in that cloſe & ſorrowfull priſon, and for want of of fresh aire, her health began to be empaired; whereupon the Lord Shandoys one of her Keepers, obtained that shee might walke into the Queenes lodgings, the windowes being shut only in presence of himselfe, the Lord Chamberlaine, and three of the Queenes Gentlewomen sent her for the same purpose; which fauour was further increased by liberty to walke into the Garden, the other prisoners commanded, not so much as to looke into the place while her Grace remained therein.

Liberty obtained to walke in the Garden.

(59) During which time, there vsually repaired vnto her a little boy, about foure yeeres of age (a mans son of the Tower) in whose pretty prattling she tooke great pleasure; his vse was to bring her flowers, and to receiue at her hands such things as commonly please Children: which lastly brought a great suspition into the Lord Chamberlaines working head, that by this Child, letters were brought betwixt the Princes Elizabeth, & the L. Courtney, whereupon the Boy was threatned, and his Father commanded not to suffer him any more to resort to her Grace: which notwithstanding, the next day hee did, but the doore being shut, and he peeping thorow a hole, cried vnto her, Mistresse, I can bring you no more flowers now.

A child suspected, and forbidden to visit Lady Elizabeth.

(60) It was reported (saith Fox) if the relation bee true, that a Writ subscribed vnder certaine Councellors hands, was directed for the present death of the Lady Elizabeth, which he doth wholly impute vnto Winchesters working. This sudden charge giuen for her present execution, sore grieued M^r. Bridges then Lieutenant of the Tower, who forthwith repaired vnto the Queene, to know her further pleasure therein: but shee being altogether ignorant of any such warrant, blamed the doers, and gaue a contrary command, whereby was preserued the life of her Sister: which howsoeuer (to the distasture of her enemies) it was prolonged, yet her State of lifes securitie seemed little better, and her feares presently conceiued, were nothing the lesse: for the Constable discharged, Sir Henry Bennifield a more seuere Iaylor was placed in his roome, who with an hundred Souldiers in blue coates entred vpon his charge: at sight whereof the fearefull Princes demanded, whether the Scaffold whereon Lady Iane suffred, was still standing: or whether Sir Henry (a man to her altogether vnknowne) made any conscience of murther, if hers was committed vnto his charge.

Sr. Henry Bennifield his seueritie and Story.

(61) The nineteenth of May her Grace was remooued from the Tower towards Woodstocke, Sir Henry Bennifield being her Conductor, vnto whom Sir Iohn Williams Lord Tame was ioyned in Commission. The first night shee was brought vnto Richmond, where all her owne seruants were remooued from her presence, and the rascall Souldiers set to attend her person; by which seuere beginnings, shee much doubted that her dayes were neere spent, and in that place her life must take end: whereupon calling together her seruants, desired them to pray for her; for this night (said shee) I thinke I must die; which lamentable words drew fountaines of teares out of their eyes; and thereupon her Gentleman Vsher went downe vnto the Lord Tame in the Court, desiring him vnfainedly to shew, whether his Lady and Mistresse that night were in danger of death, whereby himselfe and fellowes might take such part as God would appoint? Mary, God forbid, quoth the Lord Tame, that any such wickednesse should be intended, which rather then it should bee wrought, I and my men will die at her foote.

Lady Elizabeth is remooued to Woodstocke.

The great feares of Lady Elizabeth.

(62) With no greater comfort proceeded shee towards Woodstocke: Sir Henry her Iaylor (as shee tearmed him) euer carrying so hard a hand in his Commission; that the people, who with teares pressed to meet her in the passage, and with prayers saluted her in most louing manner, hee both threatned, and draue backe, calling them Traitors and Rebels against the Queene and her Lawes; and whereas in certaine villages, Bels were rung as shee passed for joy (as they conceiued) of her deliuerance, Sir Henry Bennifield tooke the matter so distastfull, that he commanded the Bels to surcease, and set the Ringers thereof in the stocks; so that not without cause this louing Lady sent this word vnto her poore seruāts, & well-wishing friends, Tanquam ouis, as a sheep to the slaughter, so am I led. And surely had not the Lord Tame been more comfortable in his place vnto this distressed Princesse, her spirit of hopes had beene spent before the conduction of her person had beene accomplished.

The joy that the people conceiued of Lady Elizabeths deliuerance.

(63) Neither in Woodstocke was her libertie much inlarged, nor feares any lesse, shee being inclosed in none of the best Lodgings, guarded with Souldiers both day and night; and although shee had had leaue into ſome Gardens, yet were fiue or ſixe lockes betwixt her walke and her lodgings, and all made faſt after her entrance. It was alſo ſuſpected that the Keeper of Woodſtocke, a notorious Ruffian, was inſtigated to kill this innocent Princeſſe, as alſo that one Baſſet a Darling of Biſhop Gardiners, came to Bladen-bridge, a mile from Woodſtocke, accompanied with twentie men in priuy Coates, earneſtly deſiring to ſpeake with Lady Elizabeth, pretending ſecret and importunate buſineſſe: but Sir Henry her Keeper gone to the Court, had giuen ſtraight charge to his brother, that none ſhould haue acceſſe vnto her before his returne, though they came from the Councell, or Queene her ſelfe. Whereby that deſigne was happily loſt. What his errand was, I will not determine, but others haue conceiued it was for no good.

Lady Elizabeth in danger to be murthered.

(64) Another accident alſo hapned, whether of purpoſe, or otherwiſe, I cannot ſay; but ſurely it was to the danger of her life: for on the ſudden her lodgings were on fire, which began to kindle betwixt the boords and ſeeling vnder the Chamber where ſhee lay, and was vehemently miſtruſted to be purpoſely done. Theſe and the like feares daily hapning, drew the diſtreſſed Princeſſe into many paſſions, whereof one is reported, that ſhee ſitting ſolitary at her Priſon window, chanced to ſee a Maide of Woodſtocke in the Parke milking of Kine, and as ſhee ſate, merrily to ſing ouer her Pale, which ſtrucke this ſad penſiue Priſoner into a deepe meditation, preferring the Maides fortunes farre aboue her owne, and heartily wiſhed that her ſelfe were a Milke-maide; into ſuch diſtreſſe was her Princely birth brought, in which comfortleſſe thraldome, wee will a while leaue her, and returne to ſpeake of matters in the Court.

(65) Queene Mary being now chiefe Pilot her ſelfe, and ſet at the helme of all Soueraigne power, ſteered the ſterne of her zealous affections, according to her owne liking; when preſently vpon her Coronation began a Parliament at Weſtminſter, and a Conuocation in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Pauls in London, where ſhee commanded a free diſputation for Religion, without any danger of offence. The Queſtions to be controuerſed, were concerning a Catechiſme ſet forth in King Edwards dayes, and the preſence of Chriſt in the Sacrament of his Supper. For Popiſh Tranſubſtantiation ſtood Diſputers Doctor Moreman, Doctor Watſon, Doctor Chedſey, Maſter Harpsfield, and Maſter Morgan, Doctor Weſton Deane of Weſtminſter appointed for Prolocutor: For Chriſts ſpirituall preſence were Mr. Haddon, Mr. Elmar, Mr. Cheyney, Mr. Philpot, and Maſter Perne: theſe meeting ſixe ſeuerall daies, diſputed onely vpon the laſt queſtion: but with ſuch diſagreement, as laſtly, Queene Mary commanded Bonner to diſſolue the aſſembly, without any Subſcriptions to the aſſertions premiſed.

(66) And not long after, Thomas Cranmer Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Nicholas Ridley Biſhop of London, and Hugh Latimer ſometimes Biſhop of Worceſter, were ſent from the Tower of London vnto Oxford to diſpute vpon the ſaid Argument againſt Doctor Treſham, Doctor Cole, Dr. Oglethorpe, Dr. Pie, Maſter Harpſfield, and Mr. Pecknam, all Oxford men, vnto whom from Cambridge were ioyned Dr. Yong, Dr. Glinne, Dr. Seton, Dr. Watſon, Dr. Sedgewicke, and Dr. Atkinſon, Dr. Weſton againe being Prolocutor: the diſputation began vpon the ſixteenth of Aprill, and ended the twentieth of the ſame moneth, with the ſentence of thoſe three Biſhops deaths, which thorow fire gaue teſtimony of their faythes, a yeere and ſixe moneths after in the Towne Ditch of Oxford: whoſe diſputations, letters, and laſt ends, are largely ſet downe by Maſter Iohn Foxe in his Acts and Monuments of the Church, vnto whom I referre the deſirous Reader, leſt by enlarging of them, the courſe of our temporall ſtory ſhould be ouermuch interrupted with matters Eccleſiaſticall of thoſe ſorrowfull times.

(67) Queene Mary intending her marriage with Spaine, great feares were conceiued, that many calamities would follow aſwell to the Church, reformed from abuſes, as for the politicke proceedings of the Kingdomes affaires; which as ſome tooke, was prognoſticated euen from heauen it ſelfe, by a Raine-bow reuerſed, the bow turned downward, and the two ends ſtanding vpward, as alſo by two Sunnes ſhining at one time, and a good diſtance aſunder in the Skies, both which ſights appeared in London the fifteenth of February.

which is fained of the Sunne: to hinder whose purpose, the world is said to haue made sute vnto Iupiter, lest hauing more Sunnes then one, the whole frame of the Globe should be set on fire. These distastiue stomackes Queene Mary well perceiued, therefore to giue them content, shee wrote her Letters into the West, and to Wales, charging the Lord President, the Bishops of Oxford and Salisbury, to intimate the benefit thereof to the whole land, as much as might be: neither was London forgotten, whose Lord Major and Commons were sent for to the Court, and thereby the Lord Chancellor told how by this match all the Realme would be inriched, but especially London by their trade and trafficke with Spaine.

In her Letters sent them signed with her hand.

(69) Vnto Spaine were sent the Earle of Bedford, and the Lord Fitzwaters to conduct King Philip into England; the Lord Admirall with twenty eight Ships securing the Seas, the space of three moneths before: all things thus ordered, and Philip in a readinesse, tooke Barke at Corone in Galizia, and with a Nauie of an hundred and fiftie Saile directed his course for his Queene.

King Philip arriued in England.

(70) Vpon Friday the twentieth of July, he arriued at Southampton, and was the first man of that Fleet that set foot on the shore, which no sooner done, but he drew his Sword, and so bare it naked in his hand as he went. The Earle of Arundel L. Steward of the Queenes house, presented to his Highnesse the George and Garter, and the Major of Southampton the Keyes of the Towne: thither was sent the Lord Chancellor from the Queen, and he againe sent of his Nobles vnto her, who was on the way vnto Winchester, to welcome him her selfe: towards which City vpon Munday following, he set forth, being accompanied with the Marquesse of Winchester, the Earles of Arundell, Darby, Worcester, Bedford, Rutland, Pembrooke, and Surrey, the Lords Clinton, Cobham, Willoughby, Darcy, Matreuers, Talbot, Strange, Fitzwaren, and North: besides many Knights & gallant Gentlemen. His Spanish traine were the Dukes of Alua, and Medina Cœli, the Admirall of Castilla, the Marquesses of Burgues, Piscara, Saria, Valli, Aguillar, the Earles of Egmund, Horne, Feria, Chinchon, Oliuares, Saldana, Modica, Euentesalida, Landriano, Castellar, the Bishop of Cuenca, and others: so that more honourable Attendants had seldome beene seene.

The honourable traines of the two Princes.

(71) And surely the Couenants were as honourable for England that were agreed vpon betwixt them, which were branched into ten Propositions.

Holinsh. pag. 1118.

1 First was, that Philip should be stiled King of England during the Matrimony, and should assist his Queene in gouernment, but not dispose of any Lands, Offices, Benefices, or Reuenewes in the Realme.

2 That Mary by vertue of this marriage, should be admitted Queene of the Realmes and Dominions of Spaine already possessed, as of all others, that were appropriated vnto the same, during the Matrimony.

3 That for Dowry shee should receiue yeerely threescore thousand pound Flemish, if in case shee ouerliued King Philip her husband.

4 That the Issue proceeding of this marriage either male or female in the right of their mothers inheritance, in the Kingdomes either of England, or other Dominions depending, should succeed in them according to the lawes, statutes, and customes of the same.

5 That if it chanced Charles Duke of Austrich, the Infant of Spaine to die without Issue, then the eldest sonne of this Matrimony should succeed in all the Dukedomes, Earledomes, Dominions and Patrimoniall lands belonging vnto Charles the Emperour, father to the Prince of Spaine, aswell in Burgoign as in the Low Countries, in the Dukedomes of Brabant, Luxenburgh, Gelderland, Zutphane, Freeseland, in the Counties of Flanders, Artois, Holland, Zeeland, Namure, and the land beyond the Iles.

6 That the Dominions of the Low Country, and of Burgundy should be excluded from the Patrimoniall descent of the said Lord Charles, notwithstanding his Issue remained, and should be injoyed by the eldest borne of this marriage without further claime to any other Dominions belonging vnto Spaine: and the rest of the Children thereof proceeding, to haue conuenient portions and Dowry assigned them aswell out of those Countries, as out of England and the others adjoyned.

7 That if no issue male were borne of this marriage, then the Eldest female should possesse those Dominions, prouided that she shuld marry a noble man, either of the Low Country or of the Realme of England, otherwise the right of the Succession should remaine in the Lord Charles,

Charles, yet not ſo cut off, but that ſhee with the other daughters begot in this marriage, ſhould bee endowed of their fathers Lands and poſſeſſions, aſwell in Spaine as in the Low Countries.

8 That for want of Iſſue by the Lord Charles, and of heire male procreated by this marriage, in that caſe the eldeſt daughter of King Philip and Queene Mary ſhould ſucceed both in the Territories of the Low Countries, as alſo in the Realmes of England, Spaine, and the reſt, after the nature, lawes and cuſtomes of the ſame.

9 That whoſo ſucceeded, either hee or ſhee, yet ſhould the ſeuerall Dominions be gouerned by the Natiues borne in the Realmes, wholly and intirely after the priuiledges, rites and accuſtomed manner formerly vſed.

10 That a ſincere fraternity, vnity and peace ſhould be confirmed for euer betwixt theſe Nations, ſo as they ſhould mutually aide each other in all things, according to the ſtrength, forme and effect treated of at Weſtminſter, and ſubſcribed vnto at Vtericke.

(72) As theſe were agreed vpon for the Generall, ſo other particulars were articuled with the King himſelfe, which were as followeth:

1 That he ſhould not beſtow the adminiſtration of offices or benefices in the Realme of England, to any ſtranger or perſon not borne vnto the Engliſh ſubjection.

2 That his Court ſhould bee repleniſhed with Gentlemen and Yeomen the Natiues of the Land.

3 That hee ſhould make no inuaſion of ſtate againſt the Lawes and Cuſtomes of the Realme, neither violate the Priuiledges thereto belonging.

4 That he ſhould not carry the Queene out of her owne Dominions, without her ſpeciall deſire, nor none of her Children, without conſent of her Nobilitie.

5 That if ſhee ſhould die Iſſueleſſe, hee ſhould challenge no Right in the Kingdome, but ſhould ſuffer the ſucceſſion to come to her next.

6 That he ſhould not carry or ſuffer to be carried out of the Realme, either Iewels, or other things of eſpeciall eſtimation, but ſhould faithfully keepe them for the profit of the Engliſh Crowne.

7 That he ſhould not ſuffer any Ships, Gunnes, Ordnance, and other Munition of war to be conueied out of the Realme, but ſhould ſee all the Forts and Frontiers of the Land kept, and the ſame ſufficiently ſtored for their defence.

8 That neither directly nor indirectly, the Realme of England ſhould be intangled with the warres of his Father, and the French King, neither that himſelfe ſhould giue any cauſe for the breach of peace betwixt the two Realmes.

(73) Things thus ordered, with conſent of all parties, the marriage with great ſtate was ſolemnized at Wincheſter, vpon Wedneſday being the 25. of Iuly and Saint Iames day, where the Emperours Embaſſadors preſently pronounced, that in conſideration of this marriage, their Maſter had giuen vnto his ſon Philip, the Kingdomes of Naples and Ieruſalem: whereupon their Titles by Garter King at Armes, were ſolemnely proclaimed with theſe ſtiles as followeth:

Philip and Mary by the Grace of God, King and Queene of England, France, Naples, Ieruſalem, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, Princes of Spaine and Cecill, Archdukes of Auſtrich, Dukes of Millan, Burgundy and Brabant, Counties of Haſpurge, Flanders and Tyroll.

(74) And according to the ſtiles, ſo was the Majeſtie of their proceedings, hauing two Swords borne before them as they went from the Church; with other Emperiall Enſignes of their great Magnificence; which nothing was leſſened in their paſſage thorow London; where Engliſh eyes beheld Philip, after the affections of their owne hearts; ſome rejoycing as Iſrael, that Ieroboams golden calues ſhould bee againe erected, and ſome ſorrowing as Iudah, that the Brazen Serpent was not broken, all of them aſſured, that this Salomons ſufferance and his wiues zeale, would build againe the Altars that had beene caſt downe.

(75) The experience whereof Queene Mary her ſelfe had giuen, euen before ſhee was crowned, in cauſing the Latine Seruice againe to be ſaid, in diſplacing the reformed Biſhops, and in publiſhing a moſt ſtraight prohibition againſt preaching, and printed Engliſh Bookes: to all which, ſome Time-ſeruing Churchmen gaue their conſents, ſcandalizing not onely the liues of the Miniſters, but alſo the Scriptures tranſlation, and the juſt proceedings of King Edwards time; againſt all which, Maſter Bourn in a publike Sermon made at Pauls-Croſſe (in the preſence of the Lord Major and Bonner his Maſter) ſo liberally inueighed, as that that one of his Auditors with more diſtaſte then diſcretion, and more zeale then Religion, threw a Dagger at him to his great danger, and no leſſe feare, and ſuch threats murmured againſt him by the people his auditory, as had not Maſter Bradford ſtepped vp in his roome, and perſwaded them vnto quietneſſe, it had ſurely coſt the Preacher his life, which cauſed the Croſſe the next Sabbath to bee guarded by the Queenes Guard, whileſt the Preacher continued in the Pulpit.

(76) And againe the like offence was conceiued againſt Doctor Pendleton, who in the next yeere after, and in the ſame place had a Gunne deſperately diſcharged againſt him: vnto ſuch hatred their Doctrine did driue them, and vnto ſuch ſinne the ouer-feruent affectioned lay many times expoſed: And no leſſe was that Diabolicall deuice of certaine giddy Reformers, who had taught a Maide ſo to ſpeake in a wall, as her hearers beleeued it was the voice of an Angell, being none other, but moſt ſeditious ſpeeches againſt the Queenes proceedings, the Prince of Spaine, the Maſſe, and Confeſſion. In mockage whereof alſo a Cat was hanged on a gallowes neere vnto the Croſſe in Cheape, her head ſhorne, and wearing a veſture faſhioned like vnto a Cope, her fore-feet tyed with a round paper betwixt, like vnto the Papiſticall conſecrated bread; and in that manner the eighth of Aprill was ſhewed by the Preacher at Pauls-Croſſe, both to the offence and content of the Spectators. And to deride the ridiculous Idolatries of the time then in vſe, vpon Eaſter day the ſame yeere, and in the ſame Cheape, as the Prieſt of Saint Pancraſſe came to celebrate the Reſurrection, and after the accuſtomed manner put his hand into the Sepulchre for the Crucifix (therein purpoſely beſtowed) when he vſed the words of the Euangeliſt very deuoutly: Surrexit, non eſt hic, He is riſen, and not here: found it ſo indeed, for that his god was gotten away, and could neuer after be found.

(77) Theſe things (ſaith Foxe) cauſed both the Queene, and Biſhops, to conceiue an euill opinion of the Londoners; as too much fauouring of King Edwards reformation, for which cauſe Bonner commanded all Scriptures printings vpon their Churches walles, to be blotted out; and many other Injunctions to be inquired after. But from theſe vaine trifles, let vs returne to more ſerious matters in the enſuing Hiſtory.

M. Foxe Acts and Monum.

(78) Queene Mary erecting the Maſſe, and leauing the Title of Supremacy to the Pope, ſent for her kinſman Cardinall Poole to be her directer in thoſe great buſineſſes, who had beene a long time in forraine parts, and euer a fauorite vnto the See of Rome, whoſe life vntill this time, we will briefly runne ouer, ſo many dependances of ſtory relying vpon him.

(79) He was the ſonne of Margaret Counteſſe of Salisbury, the ſecond childe, and only daughter of George Duke of Clarence, ſecond brother vnto King Edward the fourth: whoſe youth was ſpent in litterature at Magdalen Colledge in Oxford; and ſtate increaſed by King Henry his kinſman, in beſtowing vpon him the Deanry of Exceſter. Then trauelled he into Italy, and at Padua ſtudied ſeuen yeers, in which time the King hauing aboliſhed the Pope, he was ſent for into England, but refuſing to returne, was proclaimed Traitor, and his Deanery giuen to another: which his loſſe was preſently repayed by his holy Father, in making him Cardinall, and imploying him in many Ambaſſages, both to the Emperour and French King, with whom he euer dealt againſt King Henry, and ſollicited others by Letters to forſake his friendſhip and obedience, which his doing brought many into danger, and for which laſtly his owne mother loſt her Head.

The life and ſtory of Cardinall Poole.

Poole made Cardinall.

(78) Then was hee made Legate of Viterbion, where he determined to haue led a more quiet life: but Pope Paul the third ſummoning the obtruded Councell of Trent, appointed Poole with two others to be his Vicegerents: Though indeed this Cardinall was none of the forwardeſt in the matter of juſtification, vnto whoſe opinion therein he drew one Morrell a learned Spaniard, who of purpoſe was ſent to diſpute the Popes Doctrine in that Councell.

(79) But this Holy Father leauing his Chaire emptie by death, a faction fell among the Electors, ſome for the French, and ſome for the Emperour, which laſt light vpon Poole, and choſe him for Pope. He altogether Imperiall, deſired a more orderly election, ſuppoſing himſelfe ſo gracious in the eyes of moſt, that the ſame would be continued to his greater praiſe.

Poole elected Pope. Goodwin lyues of Biſhops.

(80) But the French faction working vpon the aduantage, put the reſt in mind of the Emperials ſacking of Rome, the impri-impriſonment and jeſts that were made of the Pope, the abſence of many Cardinals Electors, whoſe voices they knew not, yea and Cardinall Caraffa alleaged particular exception againſt Poole the elected, charging him (as Paſquill likewiſe did) with incontinency of body, as alſo of Hereſie, for arguing vpon a iuſtifying faith in the Councell of Trent, for frequenting company with Anthonie Flaminius a knowne Proteſtant, and ſince he was Legate, that he neuer had puniſhed that doctrine with death.

Poole accuſed by Cardinall Caraffa.

(81) But theſe accuſations, were rather to ſhuub off his faire top, that Caraffa himſelfe might more eminently bee ſeene, who thought if Poole failed, to be their faireſt marke; wherein his politicke expectation was farre ouerſeene. For the Engliſh Cardinall ſo cleered himſelfe, that the French Caraffa receiued diſgrace, and all their voices went for Poole euen the ſame night, which he againe ſeemed to diſlike of, ſaying that his election ſhould not be a worke of darkeneſſe, and therefore willed them orderly to proceed vpon the next day; ſuch aſſurance had his hopes conceiued, that hee thought deſtiny had beene inforced to ſet the Papall Crowne vpon his Head.

Poole againe choſen Pope.

(82) But whether it were his double delay, or his neglecting to ſtrike when the yron was hot, the Electors change their determination, and chooſe the Cardinall of de Monte for Pope, who named himſelfe Iulius the third, and he, to congratulate Poole for his Backwardneſſe, inforced Caraffa to aske him forgiueneſſe before they departed the Conclaue. Poole thus diſappointed of the Papall Chaire, retired himſelfe vnto Verona, where, in a Monaſtery of S. Bennets (which order he had aſſumed and was the Patron) he made his Reſidence, as deſirous to leade a more contemplatiue life.

(83) But ſcarcely was he ſettled, before he heard of King Edwards death, and a meſſage ſent from Queene Mary (who had beene brought vp vnder the Counteſſe his Mother) for his returne into England. Her affection towards him, he knew was very great both for his perſon, his learning and religion, and himſelfe relied much vpon the old familiaritie betwixt them, as alſo of his birth being of the blood Royall; for which cauſes hee ſore longed home-word, not doubting but if things ſtood as he thought, to get a diſpenſation, to lay off the Hat, and to put on a Crowne.

Cardinall Poole ſent for by Queene Mary.

(84) But the Emperour miſtruſting what this Prelate intended, found deuices to hold him beyond Seas, vntill the match was concluded betweene Queene Mary and his Sonne. And hitherto Cardinall Poole applauded by the Pope, began now to enter into his frowne: for being in England, and Archbiſhop of Canterbury; his old Accuſer, the foreſaid Caraffa, had in the meane-while obtained the Papacy vnder the name of Paul the fourth, when as preſently he ſent Frier Peto, whom he conſecrated Biſhop of Sarum, and diſcharged Poole of his legatiue power: which doings the Queen tooke ſo ill, that ſhe forbade Peto to enter the land, vntill a reconciliation was made betwixt the Pope and Cardinall Poole her kinſman. Which man, as hath beene ſaid, for ſolliciting Potent Princes againſt King Henry, in the quarrell of Rome, had runne in great diſpleaſure with the Engliſh, whereby ſome Acts of Parliament were made againſt him: all which were now repealed, and Lord Reinold Poole receiued as an Angel of God, vnto whom that honorable houſe preſented a Petition, to be receiued againe into the boſome of Rome.

(85) The ſuit eaſily granted, and abſolution giuen, all things proceeded at the deuotion of the Romaniſts. Images were commanded to be erected againe in the Churches: Holy-water, Pax, and Cenſures, imployed at the Celebration of their Maſſes and Mattens: Oyle, Creame, and Spittle, vſed in the Adminiſtration of the Sacrament of Baptiſme. Altars furniſhed with Pictures, Coſtly Couerings, and the Crucifix thereon ſolemnly placed: vnto whom Lights, Candles, and Tapers, with great adoration were offered, and all to captiuate the ſenſes of the zealous Beholder, in which zeale Queene Mary her ſelfe gaue a full teſtimoniall, in reſtoring againe all Eccleſiaſticall liuings aſſumed to the Crowne, ſaying, That ſhee ſet more by the ſaluation of her owne ſoule, then ſhee did by ten Kingdomes. A worthy ſpeech verily, and good example of a Prince, but ſlowly followed of many meane ſubjects, who in this caſe do rather muzzle the mouth of the Oxe, that treadeth out their Corne, then ſuffer ſuch as ſerue at the Altar, to liue by the Altar.

But woe to the procurer of those sixe Articles, (for which many had died) enacted by King Henry the eighth, whose rigour in some sort himselfe had both qualified and repealed, which were againe put in practice, especially two, the one of them touching life, and the other losse of goods; which last was the separation of man and wife, the greatest offence to mutuall societie, and naturall affection, as can be committed; and that of life so tyrannicall, as the Law it selfe may seeme with Draco's to be writ in blood, and so tyrannically followed, that within the compasse of lesse then foure yeeres continuance, there died no lesse, for the testimoniall of their conscience in this case, then two hundred seuentie and seuen persons, without regard of degree, sexe or age.

(87) In the heate of whose flames were consumed fiue Bishops, one and twenty Diuines, eight Gentlemen, eighty foure Artificers, one hundred husbandmen seruants and labourers, twenty sixe wiues, twentie widowes, nine Virgins, two boyes, and two Infants, one of them whipped to death by Bishop Bonner, and the other springing out of his mothers wombe from the stake as shee burned, was by the Sergeants throwne againe into the fire: Which barbarous crueltie, howsoeuer the Author of Englands three conuersions, would excuse, as worthy of death; deprauing the sufferers of learning, religion, ciuill manners, and honesty of life; yet the more charitable of his owne ranke, and profession, doe pitty the spilling of so much Christian blood: the greatest point of no greater sinne, then to beleeue Christs spirituall body, to be spiritually receiued in the blessed Sacrament of his Supper.

(89) The rigor therfore that fell from his mouth; who wished many more had so suffered, when the Sword was so drawne, is farre from the precept and sufferance of Christ, that would haue euen tares grow vnpluckt, till his haruest were in, and yet if those bee his sheepe that follow his voyce, and his word sufficient to make the man of God perfect as himselfe, the Apostle hath taught, then were these excusable by their Aduersaries testimonies, whose Prolocutor in a Conuocation assembled, publikely confessed that these dejected Ministers had the Word, but the Prelates in place the possession of the Sword; which how they then made it drunke with the blood of Gods Saints, let him that hath the two-edged Sword in his mouth, at the great day of triall declare, to whose judgement and mercy I leaue them.

(87) Sixtie foure more were persecuted for their profession & faith, whereof seuen were whipped, sixteene perished in prison, and were buried in dunghils, many lay in captiuitie condemned, but were released, and saued by the happy entrance of peaceable Elizabeth; and many fled the Land in those daies of distresse, amongst whom most memorable is that of Katherine Dutchesse of Suffolke, with her husband Richard Bartie Esquire, whose Story and troubles happened as followeth.

The Storie of Katherine Dutchesse of Suffolke.

(88) The Lady Katherine was the onely daughter and sole heire of Lord William, Baron of Willoughby, and of Eresby; and the last wife of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolke, lately deceased; in whose time how she affected the Papall Profession, in Massing, and Maskings, was made knowne by cloathing a Dog in a Rotchet, and calling him Gardiner: and againe, in the dayes of King Edward, Gardiner saluting her frō his prison window in the Tower, shee told him, It was well with the Lambes, now the Wolfe was shut vp. These stucke sore vpon the Bishops stomacke, who being now risen to bee Lord Chancellour of England, and shee in disgrace with the Queene for her match in marrying Master Barty, a man too inferiour for her high estate, he thought it a fit time and occasion to requite, and to that end sent for Master Barty her husband, charging him to be indebted foure thousand pound to the Queene, which was owing her by his Ladies late Husband, the Duke of Suffolke, vnto whom shee was Executrix: but this was onely the traine of a false fire; and the Dutchesse Religion, the marke he aymed at; for whom Master Bartie so wisely wrought, as himselfe was appointed to be her perswader, and so inwardly grew with the Lord Chancellor, that by his meanes he obtained licence to trauell beyond Seas, for a debt owing to his Dutchesse by the Emperour.

The Dutchesse, no fauourer of the Popish Religion.

(89) Bartie being gone, and Lady Katherine secretly to follow, vpon the first of Ianuary with foure men, two women, and her young daughter, her selfe apparelled like a Merchants wife, from Lyon Key in London departed, the morning very very myſty, and her heart fraught with feare; for no ſooner was ſhe gone, then newes thereof came to the Court, and ſearch made after her, as far as to Leigh, before her Barke could attaine to the place: where being ſhrowded by a Merchant, vnder the name of his daughter, ſhee eſcaped to Sea; but twice her Ship with contrary windes was driuen to the ſame Shoare, to her great danger, and no little griefe: yet laſtly, ſhee arriued in Brabant, where ſhee met with her Husband; whence (being clad like a Froe) they came into Cleueland, and at Santon ſeated themſelues, till further prouiſion could be made.

(90) But the Towneſmen ſuſpecting they were not the Perſons they went for, and the Biſhop of Arras hearing that they were Proteſtants, purpoſed with the Magiſtrate to impeach their liberties, which Barty hearing of, with his Froe and Daughter, attended onely with two ſeruants, ſuddenly made away vnto Weſell, a Towne priuiledged with the Stil-yard in London. In trauell they were ouer-taken by night, the weather was rainy, and the thaw vpon a great froſt, made the way more deepe, in which diſtreſſe, his two ſeruants he ſent to ſeeke ſome reliefe, whileſt himſelfe (the ſurer on foot) bare the child; and the Dutches to eaſe him, carried his Rapier & Cloke.

The great diſtreſſe of the Dutcheſſe.

(91) Thus paſſing thorow mire, dirt, & darke night, about ſeuen of the clocke, all wet and weary, they got vnto Weſell, where he being ſuſpected to be a Launce-knight, and ſhee his woman no better then naught, could get no entertainment; the language they had not, the childe cryed pittifully, the mother wept bitterly, the cold was extreme, and the raine powred downe, as the clouds had beene broken. In this diſtreſſe, the Church-porch was thought vpon to ſhrowd them from raine, and to that end Maſter Barty ſent his two ſeruants to buy Coales and ſtraw: but repairing towards this his cold Inne, hee met with two Boyes that vnderſtood Latine, of whom he demanded for the Miniſters Houſe, who preſently brought him to the place, where he ſupped. His name was Pernſell, and had beene in England, where, of the Dutcheſſe he had receiued kinde courteſie, and now at Weſell imployed his Miniſtery among certaine Wallons, who hearing that the Dutcheſſe was fled out of England, and that at Santon ſhee liued nothing ſafe, had procured for their abode in Weſell, without making knowne who theſe Engliſh were, ſaue onely vnto the chiefe Magiſtrate.

(92) Maſter Barty deſiring to ſpeake with the Miniſter, hee preſently came down, who ſeeing the Dutches ſo diſguiſed in apparell, and bemyred in dirt, could not ſpeake vnto her for teares, and bringing them in with glad hearts, no doubt, Maſter Barty changed apparell with the good man, the Dutcheſſe with his wife, and their childe, with the childe of the Houſe: and thus were they comforted by this good Preachers meanes.

(93) Here they ſeated not long, but that a ſudden watch-word was ſent them from Sir Iohn Maſon, Queene Maries Ambaſſador in Netherland, that the Lord Paget had fained an errand to the Spaw, and that the Duke of Brunſwicke with ten Ancients, would paſſe by Weſell for the ſeruice of Auſtriche, againſt the French King, by whom the Dutcheſſe and her Husband ſhould be intercepted, and deliuered vnto the Lord Paget.

The Dutcheſſe ſought after to be impeached.

(94) From hence therefore in haſte they remooued to the Towne Wincheim in high Germany, which was ſeated in the Palſgraues Dominions, where, by his Protection, they continued till their maintenance began to ſcant, and they alſo almoſt fainting vnder ſo heauy a burthen, began to faile of all hope. At which very inſtant (GOD ſo mooving the hearts of his Princes) the Palatine of Vilua, and the King of Pole hearing of their diſtreſſe, ſent them a ſafe-conduct, vnder the Palatines Seale, with aſſurance of maintenance, if they would come vnto thoſe parts.

God doth helpe, when man doth faile.

(95) From Wincheim therefore they forth-with departed, and in Wagon took towards Franckford, but by the Langraues Captaine were intercepted and ſet vpon in the high way, ſo that Maſter Barty was forced to ſtand at defence, wherein the Captaines Horſe was ſlaine vnder him, and the cry maintained, that he was ſlain himſelfe: whereupon Barty by the counſell of the Dutcheſſe, and ſwiftneſſe of his Horſe fled amaine, but was ſo eagerly followed vpon opinion of murther, that he hardly eſcaped with life; yet laſtly they got into Poland, where they were honourably entertained vntill the death of Queene Mary, whoſe life in the meane while let vs returne to relate.

joy whereof Te Deum was commanded solemnly to bee sung, and processions, and Prayers, made for her safe deliuerance. The Queene tooke her Chamber, the Court was full of Mid-wiues, and Gentlewomen attendants, Rockers were prouided, the Cradle prepared, and all made so certaine, that some were punished for making doubt of the contrary. Insomuch that it passed in Parliament, that if God should take away Queene Mary, this their young Master comming into the World, should finde himselfe prouided for; where it was by Act ordained, that King Philip should be Protector of her Issue, and Gouernour of the Realmes, vntill their Prince or Princesse should come to able yeeres.

(97) Howbeit as it should seeme, this Spanish King had little confidence in the English, for, at his first entrance, he had the Hall doore of his Court continually kept shut, neither any suffered to enter, vnlesse his busines was first made known: the Lords hauing leaue to depart London, had strait commandement to send all their Harnesse & Artillery to the Tower; which was done, in regard of the maligners of this marriage: yea, and somewhat doubtfull he was also of those, who in shew bare him a faire face; the rather for that * a Nobleman in consultation, had giuen his counsell to cut off Lady Elizabeths head, assuring himselfe, that those so bad minded to their naturall Princesse, could not be better vnto him a stranger: who contrariwise vpon this ground so laid the foundation of his true honour, as it gained him loue of true English hearts: for from that day he neuer left to sollicite his Queene for the deliuery of that innocent Princesse her Sister, who still remained a solitary Prisoner in Woodstocke, though no proofes could bee brought for any offence.

The feares of King Philip.

Lord Paget.

King Philip, a great friend vnto Lady Elizabeth.

(98) At last his suit was obtained, and Lady Elizabeth brought vnto Hampton Court, hauing not seene the Queene for two yeeres before: here she was lockt vp, and laid at by Gardiner to submit her selfe, till some foureteene dayes after, she was sent for into the Queenes Chamber about ten of the Clocke in the night: which shee no sooner had entred, but falling vpon her knees, shee prayed God to preserue her Soueraigne Majesty; protesting her loyaltie and truth to her Person, whatsoeuer had beene spoken or instigated to the contrary. Vnto whom the Queene somewhat sharpely said; Then you will not confesse your offence, I see; but rather stand stoutly vpon your truth; I pray God your truth may so fall out. If not (quoth the Princesse) I request neither fauour nor pardon at your Majesties hand. Well then, said the Queene, you stand so stiffely vpon your own loyalty, belike you suppose to haue beene wrongfully punished. I must not say so to your Majesty, said Lady Elizabeth. But you will then so report to others it seemeth, said Queene Mary. No, and it please your Majesty, said the Lady, I haue borne, and must beare the burthen my selfe, I most humbly beseech your Graces good opinion of me, & to thinke me your true Subject, which from the beginning hitherto I haue euer beene, and will be for euer so long as my life lasteth. The Queene replying in Spanish, said, God knoweth: and so they departed; King Philip as is thought, standing behind the Arras, heard what was said.

Lady Elizabeth brought in presence of the Queene.

The conference of the Queene, and Lady Elizabeth.

(99) Some seuen dayes after, her Grace was discharged of Benefield her Iaylor, and had leaue of liberty, yet so, that Sir Thomas Pope, a Priuy Councellor, and M. Gage the Queenes Gentleman Vsher, were still her Attendants all Queene Maries time: her Gentlewoman Mistresse Ashley was sent to the Fleete, and three other waiting Maides vnto the Tower; but the death of Gardiner immediately following, these stormes grew more calmer, and Lady Elizabeth euery day more affectionately respected.

Lady Elizabeth discharged of imprisonment.

(100) About this time, William Constable, alias Fetherston, a Millers sonne in the North, bruted himselfe to bee King Edward the sixt, but was seconded by none of any esteeme, and therefore the lesse dangerous or likely to be beleeued. Notwithstanding, all diligent search was laid for the Counterfeit; and he lastly taken at Eltham in Kent, from whence to Hampton Court hee was presently conueyed, where his answers were so simple, that he was esteemed as a frantick, and sent to the Marshal-See for a Lunaticke foole: and from thence in a Cart this counterfeit King (whose Crowne was a paper inscribed with his fault) was brought vnto Westminster, and from thence whipped to Smithfield, whence he was banished into the North, and without further punishment was so released: But this Fetherston the next yeere (as a Dogge returning to his vomit) gaue it forth that King Edward was aliue, whereupon he was againe apprehended, condemned of Treason, and hanged at Tyborne.

Reports of the Queenes deliuerance.

(101) Now the expected time of Q. Maries deliuerance being fully approached, a rumour ranne in London and elsewhere, that a Prince was borne; for joy whereof the Bels were rung, the Bonefires flamed, Processions made, and some in their Sermons described the beauty of that goodly Boy, and great Prince. At Antwerpe also the like triumphs were made by the English Merchants, the Mariners shooting off their Ordnance; for which an hundred Pistolets were sent them from the Lady Regent: but these flying reports prooued but wind, which turned the Vane shortly into another point; for the truth bursting forth, told for a certaine, that the Queene had neuer beene conceiued, neither indeed was euer like to be: which raised as many doubts, as had bin tales of her deliueranoe: some affirming, that she was with Child, but miscarried; some, that shee was deceiued by a Tympany: and some, that this rumour was spred for a policy: but what the truth was, saith Grafton, I referre vnto others that know more.

(102) King Philip thus frustrate of his hope for his Heire, vpon the fourth of September went ouer the Seas to visit his Father the Emperour, and to take possession of the Low-Countries, where hee stayed one yeere and sixe moneths, to the great griefe of Q. Mary his wife, whom as some thought, he little affected, and this his long stay made the suspition no lesse. But now returning to Douer, he was by his Queene met on the way, and brought thorow London, accompanied with many Peeres of the Realme, as in triumph against a Coronation.

(103) In whose absence many conspiracies had been intended, but their foggy smoakes were vtterly extinguished before the fire could burst into flame: for certaine persons plotting to robbe the Queens Exchequer at Westminster, meant with the money to raise warre in the Land; the Leaders into this attempt were Henry Peckham, Iohn Daniel, Richard Vdall, Iohn Throckmorton, Iohn Dethicke, William Stanton, William Rossey, Iohn Beadell, and White the reuealer of the same intendments. These all, excepting White, were at sundry times executed, and Sir Anthony Kingston apprehended for the same, died on the way vnto London.

(104) The like stirres were attempted by one Cleber a Schoolemaster, sometime at Dys in Norfolke, who in the Parish Church of Yarle, among a great assembly at the celebration of a marriage, stood vp, and read a penned, but trayterous Proclamation against the Queen, perswading the people to take Armes, and to free the Land of wrongs done by Strangers.

Conspiracies in Norfolke.

(105) So likewise Thomas Stafford, second sonne to the Lord Stafford, with other Conspirators against the King and Queene, fearing the just punishments for their deserts, had fled the Land into parts beyond the Seas; from whence attempting still to broach their Rebellions, they sent certaine Bookes and Letters written and printed, full of most slanderous vntruthes: and now following King Philip into England, assisted by some English and Strangers, tooke by stealth the Castle of Skarborough in Yorkeshire, where he published a most shamefull Proclamation against the Queene, trayterously affirming, that she was neither rightfull, nor worthy of Raigne, and that the King had giuen vnto his Spaniards the greatest and strongest holds of the Land. But by the prowesse of Thomas Percie (presently created Earle of Northumberland) hee was surprized, sent to London, and there made shorter by the head. All these stirres quieted, new troubles were rather sought for, then ministred, and more losse followed to Englands dishonour, then glory had beene gained by this Spanish great Match.

Thomas Stafford beheaded.

(106) For the Emperour ouer-worne with the affaires of the world, and wearied with the troubles of turmoyling warres, or rather touched with remorce of conscience, for the infinite miseries brought by him vpon Florence, Naples, Sicilie, Tuscane, Elbe, and Calabria, being perswaded that these mournefull iarres of Christian Princes, had giuen to the Turke aduantage vpon diuers parts of Europe, he called his Son King Philip of England, vnto Bruxels (as is said) where, by authenticke Letters bearing date the fiue and twentieth of October, he resigned all his Realmes vnto him, commanding all his Estates and Subjects to acknowledge and hold him their lawfull King; and among many other instructions and most wise exhortations, gaue him charge chiefly to hold amity with the French, lest otherwise the warres of those Puissant Nations might oppresse all Christendome.

Charles the Emperour resigneth all his Dominions to his soune King Philip.

(107) King Philip indeed was much inclined to peace, & Queene Mary his wife at that time much more, both to hold him with her at home, and to support the Religion which she had raised, by restoring ring the Clergy their wonted poſſeſſions, whereof much was then held in the Noblemens hands, from whoſe hard hold, hardly could any thing be wreſted; but thoſe in her owne, ſhe freely reſigned by Parliament, with this moſt Chriſtian reſolution, and Princely ſaying: That ſhe ſet more by the ſaluation of her owne Soule, then ſhee did by the Reuenewes of ten Kingdomes; and ſo committed the reſtauration and diſpoſe thereof vnto the Pope, and Cardinall Poole his Legate, to the great wealth of the Church, and impouerifhing of the Crowne.

(108) King Philip following his Fathers aduice, made peace with France to continue for fiue yeeres, which no ſooner was made, then was againe broken, but moſt of all to the loſſe of the Engliſh: for the Kings did not loue, though their weapons were laid downe, and ancient hatred bred daily new diſcontents: one principal was miniſtred by Pope Paul the fourth, then an enemy vnto the Spaniard, whom Duke Alua had mued vp within the walles of Rome: His hope of helpe was in Henry the French King, vnto whom he ſent a triumphant Hat, with a ſtately Sword, and thereupon had ſuccour by the Guize, who by force made his way open into Rome: But the French decreaſing for want of pay, and the Spaniard ſtill raiſing their Trophees of victory, the Pope thought it ſureſt to hold with the ſtrongeſt, and ſo made fruſtrate his amitie with the French.

The Pope beſieged ſendeth to France for helpe.

Iohn Sleidon.

(109) Queene Mary of England, now the Pope was for Spaine, and Philip her husband preparing for France, to ſhew her great loue and obedience to both, rather ſought an occaſion againſt King Henry, then any miniſtred by him for the breach of peace. Her pretences were many, as that the French King had inſtigated one Dudley and Aſhton, vnto a new conſpiracy, which they conſulted vpon in his Ambaſſadors Houſe in London, and being reuealed, fled into France, where they were maintained by an annuall penſion. The like ſhe alleaged againſt King Henry for ſuccouring of Stafford, and his rebellious Complices, for ſuffering his Pyrats to moleſt her Seas, & for want of more, renewed the remembrances of Northumberland and Wyats rebellions, who as was alleaged, were ſupported by him.

Iune 7. A defiance ſent into France.

(110) Theſe things premiſed, a defiance was ſent into France, and was pronounced vnto Henry at Rhemes by Clarenceaux King at Armes. The French King loth to heare of theſe warres, made his anſwer and preparations accordingly: and Queene Mary contrary to promiſe, intangling her Subjects with the quarrels of the Spaniards, with ſound of Trumpet in London proclaimed warres againſt France. To proſecute which, King Philip her husband paſſed ouer to Callis, and thence into Flanders, where he made prouiſion to enter the Field: after whom the Queene ſent a thouſand Horſemen, foure thouſand Footmen, and two thouſand Pioners, and the Earle of Pembrooke was appointed Captaine Generall, vnder whom in ſeuerall places ſerued Vicount * Montacute, the Lord Grey of Wilton, the Earle of * Rutland, the Earle of * Lincolne, the Earle of Bedford, the Earle of * Leiceſter, and the Earle of Warwicke, the Lords Howard, De la Ware, Windſor, Bray, Shandoys, and Dudley, with many other Knights of approoued valiancy.

(111) Theſe paſſing the Seas, joyned with King Philip, whileſt the Dukes of Sauoy and Brunſwicke, the Earles of Egmond, Horne, and Mansfield, had inuaded the French confines, and planted a ſtrong ſiege before Saint Quintins; to whoſe reſcue Monſieur Mountmorancy Conſtable of France, came with nine hundred men at Armes, as many light Horſemen, ſeuen hundred Roiſters, twenty two Enſignes of Lancequenents, and ſixteene Enſignes of the French: and thus furniſhed, he meant to put more Souldiers into the Towne, but in the aſſay ſo miſcarried, that himſelfe was both hurt and taken priſoner with eight Noblemen more, all of them Knights of the Order, and not many dayes after, King Philip with his Engliſh came to the ſiege, by whoſe manly proweſſe Saint Quintins was taken, for joy whereof great triumphs were made in England, which long laſted not, through the loſſe of Callis.

S. Quintins taken by the Engliſh. Auguſt 20.

(112) For this great victory made the Engliſh both negligent and careleſſe, ſo that the Towne of Callis, and the Forts thereabout for defence, were vnreſpectiuely regarded, and beſides the neglect of ſupply to thoſe pieces, the Souldiers thinking all out of danger, ſtood gazing at the ſhadow, till the ſubſtance was loſt: for the French being nettled, that Saint Quintins was Philips, let ſlip no occaſion wherein was aduantage: and the Duke of Guize imploying the Conſtables place, determined to put to proofe an enterprize for Callis, which long and many times had beene purpoſed vpon.

The Engliſh negligent, after Saint Quintins was wonne.

(113) This

(113) This danger fore-ſeene, intelligence thereof was ſent into England, but no ſupply heard of: firſt, the Maſter of the Ordnance poſted to the Councell, and ſecondly, followed the Captaine of the Caſtle himſelfe, but either by wilfull negligence or lacke of credit with the Queene and Councell, thoſe buſineſſes in France were ſlenderly regarded, vntill the ſupply was altogether too late. For the Duke of Guize with a maruellous celerity approached the Engliſh Frontier, vnder a colour to victuall Boloigne and Ard, and vpon a little ſorry plat of ground, intrenched at Sandgate, and thence diuiding his Army into two parts, ſent the one vnto Ricebanke, whileſt the other laid battery to two Forts at once, both which hee wan within the ſpace of twelue houres, the Captaine and Souldiers ſecretly departing to Callis. (114) Then were Cannons mounted againſt Callis it ſelfe, and with continuall battery for three dayes together, a breach made in the wall, not farre from the Water-gate, but yet vnaſſaultable, the Engliſh within ſo maintained the defence: this then a traine of falſe fire (for the French neuer meant their acceſſe that way) whileſt all attended to make good the breach, the Duke had planted fifteene double Cannons againſt the Caſtle, which once perceiued, the Callizians knowing their reſiſtance too weake, ſtored Barrels of Gun-powder within the Keepe, meaning to blow vp the French if they there entred, but that deuice failed; hauing waded thorow the ditch, their clothes dropping wet, diſabled the traine of powder to take fire, ſo that the French got the Caſtle, with the death of Sir Anthony Ager, Marſhall of the Towne, his ſonne and heire, and foureſcore Engliſh beſides.

(115) The Lord Wentworth then Deputy of the Towne, ſeeing all in like danger, if meanes were delayed, ſent vnto the Caſtle to haue a Parlee for compoſition, which the French forth-with accepted, and ſent out two Gentlemen for pledges, whileſt Iohn Hiefield Maſter of the Ordnance, and Edward Hall Conſtable of the Caſtle, concluded vpon theſe diſhonourable Articles, as followeth:

Callis ſurrendered to the French.

1 That the Towne, the great Artillery, Victuals and Munition ſhould bee yeelded freely to the French.

2 That the liues of all the Inhabitants ſhould be ſaued, and haue their ſafe-conduct to depart.

3 That the Lord Deputy, with fifty others whom the Duke would appoint, ſhould remaine priſoners, and be put to their ranſome.

Vnhonourable Articles.

(116) Things thus ordered, the Engliſh were commanded into the Churches of our Lady, and Saint Nicholas, where they remained that whole day, the night following, and vntill the next day in the afternoone, without either meate or drink, in which time the Duke of Guize commanded by Proclamatiõ, that all Iewels, Plate and Mony, to the value of a Groat, ſhould be laid vpon the Altar, and that vpon paine of death: a ſorrowfull offertory towards the Engliſh, and a great inrichment vnto the French. Then was the Towne voided of fiue hundred ordinary Souldiers (a ſmall Garriſon indeed to manne ſuch a place) of Towneſmen, women and Children, foure thouſand two hundred; the Lord Wentworth, Deputy, Sir Ralph Chamberlaine Captaine of Ricebanke, Nicholas Alexander Captaine of Newnambridge, Edward Grimſton, Iohn Rogers, and others, to the number of fiftie were ſent priſoners into France, vntill ranſome were paid: And thus the Towne and Forts that were wonne by the victorious King Edward the third, and that by no leſſe then eleuen moneths ſiege, hauing now beene poſſeſſed by the Engliſh the ſpace of two hundred and eleuen yeers, was in the compaſſe of eight dayes beſieged, ſurprized and wonne in the depth of Winter, to the Worlds wonder, and great ſuſpition of treachery, which happened the ſeuenteenth day of Ianuary, and in the ſame moneth were ſurrendred the ſtrong Forts of Guizes, and Hames, whereby all the Engliſh footing was loſt in the Continent of France.

Edward, the eleuenth from William the Conquerour, wanne it: and Mary the eleuenth from Edward, loſt it.

(117) This winning of Callis and the other ſtrong holds, as they were ioyous to the French, and with Te Deum & Bonefires celebrated with no leſſe ſolemnity, then was that for the recouery of the County Oye, and the Fort won from the Engliſh in An. 1347. ſo was it grieuous vnto the Engliſh Nobility, & moſt of all vnto Queene Mary her ſelfe. Inſomuch as ſhee ceaſed not to trauell with the King and Councell how to couer the diſhonour of her Raigne, by this loſſe of Callis; and albeit ſome aſſayes were made againſt Breeſt, and Mounſieur Thermes the new new Captaine of Callis taken priſoner by Count Egmont Generall for King Philip in the Low Countries, yet the maine was neglected, and could not be recouered for any compoſition, which ſtrucke ſo deepe a melancholy into Queene Maries minde, as ſhee letted not to ſay, that the loſſe of Callis was written in her heart, and might therein be read when her body ſhould be opened. In which paſſions ſhee continued the reſt of her Raigne, which neuer had beene very proſperous, nor greatly pleaſurable vnto her ſelfe, after ſhe had aboliſhed the Goſpel, reſtored the Popes Supremacy, and married a Stranger, who was vnto her a Stranger indeed.

Queene Maries ſayings for the loſſe of Callis.

(118) Of all ſince the Conqueſt her Raigne was the ſhorteſt, onely excepting that of Richard the Tyrant, but much more bloody then was his, and more blood ſpilt in that ſhort time of her Raigne, then had beene ſhed for caſe of Chriſtianitie in any Kings time ſince Lucius the firſt eſtabliſher of the Goſpell in this Realme. Her conceptions failing, extreme dearths raging, hurt done by thunders from heauen, and by fire in the Royall Nauy, forraigne loſſes, Callis ſurrendered, and King Philips keeping from Court, daily augmented Queene Maries melancholy, which laſtly increaſing to a burning Feauer, made an end of her life, at her Mannor of S^t^. Iames neere Weſtminſter, the ſeuenth of Nouember, and yeere of Chriſts incarnation 1558. when ſhee had raigned fiue yeeres, foure moneths, and eleuen dayes, and liued forty two yeeres, nine moneths and ſixe dayes, whoſe body lyeth interred in a Chappell in the Minſter of S^t^. Peters at Weſtminſter, without any Monument or other remembrance.

CHAPTER XXIIII.

An. Dom. 1558.

THE cloud thus set that threatned more stormes, and a quiet calme happening when the rage was at highest, that wished Sun then ascended our Horizon, whose rayes (as had beene hoped) presently dispelled all foggy mysts from Englands faire skie; which was, the most mild Princesse Lady Elizabeth, another Debora, and nursing mother of Gods Saints, who being then at Hatfield in Hertfordshire, was there first saluted

Queene,

Queene, and the ſame day, with great joy and full conſent of both the Houſes of Parliament (at that time aſſembled) was ſolemnly proclaimed Queene of England, with all other ſtiles rightly belonging to that Imperiall Title.

(2) Shee entred her gouernment vpon Thurſday the ſeuenteenth of November, the ſame day that her Siſter Queene Mary died, the yeere of Chriſts aſſuming our fleſh, 1558. and of her own age, twenty foure yeeres, two moneths and ten daies. From *Hatfield ſhee remooued vnto Charterhouſe in London; * from whence ſhe was royally attended vnto the Tower, and all Complements prepared for her Coronation. In which time Proclamations came forth, forbidding any man to preach, but by appointment, or to alter any Ceremonies, but according to the rites in her owne Chappell, as alſo that the Letanie, the Epiſtles and Goſpels ſhould bee read in all Churches in the Engliſh tongue.

The firſt proclamation touching Religion.

(3) All things in a readineſſe, vpon the foureteenth of Ianuary, with great triumphs and ſumptuous ſhewes, ſhe paſſed thorow London towards Weſtminſter, to receiue the Imperiall Crown; but before ſhee entred her Chariot in the Tower, acknowledging that the ſeat was Gods into which ſhe was to enter, & ſhe his Vicegerent to weild the Engliſh Scepter; in that royall Aſſembly, with eyes & hands eleuated to heauen; vpon her knees, ſhee prayed for his aſſiſtance, as Salomon did for wiſedome when hee tooke the like charge; with a thankefull remembrance vnto God for his continued preſeruation, who had brought her thorow great dangers vnto that preſent dignitie. In which triumphall State as ſhee paſſed thorow the ſtreetes of London, when the Booke of God was preſented vnto her at the little Conduit in Cheape, ſhe receiued the ſame with both her hands, and kiſſing it, laid it to her breſt, ſaying, That the ſame had euer beene her chiefeſt delight, and ſhould be the rule by which ſhe meant to frame her Gouernment. And to teſtifie her benigne acceptance of the Lord Major, and Citizens approoued loues, Shee aſſured them, that ſhe lacked no will, nor (as ſhe hoped) power to be to them as gracious a Prince as euer raigned in the Land, and that for the publike good, if occaſion were miniſtred, ſhee would ſpend her deareſt blood.

Her paſſage thorow London.

(4) The fifteenth of Ianuary (being Sunday) the Coronation was ſolemnly performed, and the Imperiall Crowne ſet on her head by Doctor Owen Oglethorpe Biſhop of Carlile, the Archiepiſcopall See of Canterbury beeing vacant euer ſince her entrance, by the death of Cardinall Poole, who died the ſame day that Queene Mary did.

Her Coronatiõ.

Cardinall Poole and Q. Mary died both in one day.

(5) Preſently there followed a Parliament, wherein the Title of Supremacy was againe reſtored to the Crowne, with the firſt fruites, and Tenths of all Eccleſiaſticall liuings, and the Booke of Common prayer ratified for an vniforme celebration of Gods Diuine Seruice in the Engliſh Churches; as alſo thoſe Acts repealed that were enacted by Queene Mary, in fauour of the Romiſh Religion. Things thus eſtabliſhed, and liberty giuen to the Goſpell; many that had fled the Realme in caſe of conſcience, returned, and were prouided for according to their worths; and that Gods Truth might be eſtabliſhed, (which thing her Princely heart chiefly ſought after) a conference was commanded and begun at Weſtminſter the laſt of March, concerning certaine Articles to be diſcuſſed amongſt the Diuines. The Propoſitions were three:

(6) During the time of this Parliament, a Petitiõ was made vnto her Majeſty for the hope of royall Iſſue, to mooue her vnto marriage; vnto which eloquent Orati-

"with great thankes for their louing care

"touching their requeſt, ſhee anſwered,
"that from the time, when firſt ſhee con-

"certainely knew not; yet this ſhee aſ-
"ſured them, that as then ſhee ſtood ſo
"affected, and if that affection changed, "her choiſe ſhould bee onely of ſuch a

"would not ſay, as her ſelfe, (becauſe ſhe
"knew her ſelfe beſt) but as any of them
"for the Realmes good, and yet withall

"for their welfare (if neede were) would

(7) For the cauſe of Religion ſhee ſent into Germany touching a league defenſiue, the Pope troubling the waters of that cleare fountaine, and diſabling her Title with the calumny of illegitimation. In the meane-while a peace being on foot betwixt the Kings of France and Spaine, Queene Elizabeth alſo interpoſed for England, wherein the reſtoring of Callis was a maine point, whereupon her Highneſſe ſtood, which was thus:

Her firſt actions with foraine Princes.

Ex Manuſcript. Hen. Killigrew.

(8) The Earle of Arundell, the Biſhop of Ely, and Doctor Wotton Deane of Canterbury, remained Commiſſioners in France at the death of Queene Mary, vpon compoſition for the regaining of Callis, and other pieces loſt in the cauſe of King Philip: her Majeſty ſent them Inſtructions to continue their demands, and certaine ſure grounds whereon they might work. The firſt was, that the quarrell of warre was not Englands, but Philips of Spaine, in whoſe fauour Queene Mary his wife againſt the will of her Councell, ſent him aid of her Subiects. And if in caſe the French ſhould challẽge Callis as inhereditary vnto the Crowne of France, to that they ſhould anſwer, that there were many Signiories & places in France, whereunto the Engliſh might make their juſt claime, and ſome in poſſeſſion ſince Callis was Engliſh, which Towne was not onely lawfully granted, and aſſured from the French themſelues vnto the Crowne of England, but was alſo allowed by Articles of all Treatiſes of Peace, for the ſpace of two hundred yeeres and more, this euermore ſpecially prouided, That Callis ſhould remaine in the quiet poſſeßion of the Engliſh.

Shee claimeth reſtitution of Callis from the French.

Proofes that Callis was Englands.

And the better to impreſſe the deliuery of Callis, in the mould of the French, they were to demand certaine arrerages, wherein their King & Realme had ſalne for great ſummes of monies and debts accruing to the Engliſh Crowne: aſwell by the acknowledgement of the mother of King Francis then being Regent of France, and judgement thereupon giuen; as alſo by the treatie of More, de dato, 1525. The treaty of perpetuall peace, de Dato, 1527. and the late treatie betweene King Henry the eighth, and King Francis, for the deliuery of Bullein, de Dato, 1546. by all which appeareth, that there were two Millions of Crownes due, and very little thereof yet paid, the Copies of which treatiſes and confeſſion, the ſaid Com-

Commiſſioners haue with them. Alſo another debt of an hundred thouſand Crownes, as appeareth by a Bill of King Francis hand. And where alſo there is one perpetuall penſion of fifty thouſand crownes due, as appeareth by the treaty of perpetuall peace, and one other penſion of Salt, as appeareth by the ſame treatie. All which notwithſtanding, rather then the French ſhould retaine Callis, her Majeſtie was contented to remit the whole debt and arrerages: but without that, in no wiſe ſhee held it conuenient to conclude peace with France, and that obtained, ſhee remitted the other Articles to the diſcretion of the Commiſſioners. But the Engliſh Queene was no more deſirous to haue Callis, then the French King vnwilling to let it go. Whereupon laſtly it was thus concluded, That Callis ſhould remaine French, the terme of eight yeers, and thoſe expired, ſhould returne to the Engliſh vpon forfeiture of fiue hundred thouſand crownes; the branch of which agreement, from the Latine, and that from the originall, is thus tranſlated:

(9) It is couenanted, agreed, and concluded, that the ſaid moſt noble Lady Queene of England, ſhall ſuffer and permit the foreſaid moſt Chriſtian King of France, his heires and ſucceſſors, to hold, poſſeſſe, and peaceably injoy, from the day of the date of this preſent treaty, vntill the terme of eight yeeres following, the Towne of Callis, with the appertinances and appendices belonging to the ſame; and alſo the Port or Hauen of the ſaid Towne, with the Tower of Ruysbanke, and alſo the Towers, Lordſhips, Villages, and places of Newnainbridge, Merke, Oye, Hams, Sandgate, the Tower and Towne of Guiſnes, and all the reſt of that County taken in this laſt warre, and all other Townes, Caſtles, Villages, Lands, Dominions, Territories, Waters, Riuers, Hauens, Defences, Forts and Shores, and generally all places whatſoeuer ſcituate vnto them by the Sea, which the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King hath gotten in this laſt warre, and taken by force of Armes in the Raigne of the moſt noble Lady Mary, late Queene of England. And the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King hath promiſed, and doth promiſe aſwell in his owne name, as in the name of the King Daulphin his ſonne, his heires, and ſucceſſors, for which Daulphin, the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King hath made himſelfe, and doth make himſelfe anſwerable, promiſing that he will take care of, and effect that the ſaid King Daulphin ſhall approoue this treaty, and ratifie it, within two moneths after the date of this treaty, which ſaid terme of eight yeeres beeing complete and ended, the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King, his heires and ſucceſſors ſhall preſently without delay, relinquiſh, deliuer, and reſtore, or cauſe to bee deliuered, and reſtored to the ſaid moſt noble Prince Elizabeth, Queene of England, her heires, and ſucceſſors, or to thoſe that ſhould bee thereunto deputed by her, or her heires and ſucceſſors, the ſaid Towne of Callis, with the appertinances and appendices aforeſaid, and all other and ſinguler places aforeſaid, and alſo the Towers, Caſtles, and Fortreſſes whatſoeuer in the aforeſaid parts, and alſo the places now of late builded, fortified, or reedified during the ſaid terme of eight yeeres; and the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King, his heires and ſucceſſors ſhall leaue the poſſeſſion of all the ſaid places, and depart from it, and wholly forſake the ſame. So that the moſt Noble Lady Queene Elizabeth, her heires and ſucceſſors may peaceably injoy, and quietly hold the poſſeſſion of them, with all the Rights, Priuiledges, Preeminences, Superiorities, Recognitions, and all other Authorities in the like manner, ſtate, condition and nature, in which the Kings of England haue held them, and poſſeſſed them before the beginning of this laſt warre. Prouided notwithſtanding, and expreſſely couenanted, that the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King, his heires and ſucceſſors ſhall not bee bound to reſtore or deliuer the Townes and Fortreſſes, and places aforeſaid, otherwiſe then in the ſame ſtate, manner, and condition, in which now at this preſent they are, and hereafter ſhall bee ſtrengthened and fortified by them, during the ſaid terme, yet ſo notwithſtanding, as neither in the time of ſuch reſtitution nor before, that there be not any thing done of ſet purpoſe, whereby the former ſtate of the ſtrengths, and fortifications which now it is in, or which hereafter added, by them be in any wiſe miniſhed, broken, or ouerthrowne, but that all things without fraud, be reſtored intire and vnimpaired, in manner aforeſaid.

Alſo it is couenanted and agreed, that during the terme of the ſaid eight yeeres, it ſhall neither bee lawfull for the ſaid Chriſtian King, nor for the ſaid moſt fortunate King & Queen of Scots; nor for the ſaid moſt happy Queene of England to innouate, attempt, or enterprize by warre any thing againſt each other, or for any one of the againſt the other, or againſt the Kingdomes, proper dominions, and Subjects of each other, either directly or indirectly, to the prejudice of this preſent Treatiſe, &c. And likewiſe if any thing ſhall bee ſo innouated and attempted by the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King, and moſt happy King and Queene of Scots, or the ſubjects of them, by the authoritie, commandement, & approbation of them, or any of them. Then the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King, and King Daulphin, their heires and ſucceſſors, by ſuch kinde of innouation attempted, vpon the deed done, ſhall be bound and obliged to leaue and depart from the poſſeſſion and occupation of the ſaid Towne of Callis, and of all other places aforeſaid on this ſide the Sea, taken of late from the Engliſh, by the ſaid moſt Chriſtian King. And all thoſe things they ſhall deliuer and reſtore without any delay to the ſaid moſt worthy Queene of England, in the ſame manner & forme, in which at the ſaid terme of eight yeeres, they were promiſed and couenanted to be reſtored: which reſtitution if it ſhall not bee ſo made, the ſaid Merchants and pledges ſhall be bound to pay the ſaid penalty of fiue hundred thouſand Crownes to the ſaid moſt worthy Queene of England, and the couenant notwithſtanding of reſtoring the ſaid Towne ſhall neuertheleſſe remaine in force. Moreouer if any of the Subjects of any of the Princes aforeſaid, of their owne authority, ſhall endeauour or attempt any thing againſt the Subjects of either of the ſaid Princes in prejudice of this Treatiſe, he ſhall bee puniſhed as an infringer of the peace, according to the quality of the fact.

These couenants notwithſtanding they were ſealed and ſworne vnto, yet were neuer performed at the yeeres of expiration, though Merchants were bound, and hoſtages aſſigned to remaine in England till the money were paid.

(9) So ſuſpiciouſly had this Towne of Callis beene recouered from the Engliſh, that the Lord Wentworth (the Deputy) was indited in Queene Maries daies, and now arraigned at Weſtminſter; the Marqueſſe of Northampton beeing his Iudge, and Lord Chiefe Steward of England for that day; but that Nobleman ſo nobly defended himſelfe, that he was acquitted by his Peeres, and wanne a moſt honourable opinion for his many and faithfull ſeruices.

(10) Her Highneſſe hauing thus cleered the Engliſh aire from all Papall infection, and eſtabliſhed Peace, the greateſt benefit for the Subject; on the foureteenth of May, being Whitſunday, Diuine Seruice began to bee celebrated in the Engliſh Tongue, whereby Gods Trumpet might bee heard in a perfect ſound, and the prayers of the Congregation vttered with an vnderſtanding heart. To the end therefore that the Clergy, the Teachers of others, ſhould not bee infected themſelues, the Oath of Supremacie, with other Articles, was offered vnto them, the refuſers whereof were forth-with depriued, and others ſurrogated that were more loyally affected. In place of Poole deceaſed, Doctor Parker was conſecrated Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and of Yorke, Doctor Young in ſtead of Heth, who refuſed the Oath; and ſo of ſome others: then went forth Commiſſioners to ſuppreſſe thoſe Monaſteries reſtored by Queene Mary, and to caſt out thoſe Images ſet vp in Churches, whoſe ſight hauing heated the blind zeale of many poore ignorant people in places of Oratory, were now themſelues in the ſtreets conſumed in the fire, at whoſe flames might be ſaid, as in Iſaiah touching pieces of like ſtuffe, had beene ſaid: I am warme, I haue beene at the fire.

(11) After the reducing of this purer worſhip into Gods Church, the next care the Good Queene tooke, was to inrich her Realme, by reducing her Coynes into fine and pure Sterling, and debaſing of Copper monies: cauſing likewiſe great ſtore of Munition, Armour and Powder to bee brought into the Land, and laid vp in a readineſſe as occaſion ſhould ſerue, that nothing might bee wanting either for the wealth or ſafetie of the ſubject.

(12) But theſe her bleſſed beginnings in England were little as it ſeemeth to the liking of the French King, Whoſe hope (ſaith Leſlie) by certaine Acts of Parliament made by Queene Mary againſt her Siſter the Lady Elizabeth, to debarre her from the ſucceſſion of the Crowne, was to eſtabliſh Queene Mary of Scotland, who had lately married Prince Dolphine his Sonne, laying her Title from Margaret the eldeſt daughter of King Henry the ſeuenth, linked in Marriage with Iames the fourth King of that name, ſhee being the daughter of King Iames the fifth his ſonne. And therefore as the neereſt in blood and lawfull heire to the Crowne of England, he cauſed by Proclamation in Paris her Stile to be publiſhed vnder the name of Mary Queene of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and cauſed the Armes of England to be ioyned with Scotland and France, which the Dolphine and ſhee did impale, both in their Seales, Plate, Tapiſtry, and other adornements; which cauſed great troubles (ſaith he) betwixt the Kingdomes of England, France, and Scotland.

(13) In Scotland Religion (as England had imbraced it) began to bee practiſed;

sed; Preachers spake boldly, and Bookes were daily brought thither, which nothing at all commended the Pope, and by them (saith the Bishop) the people were mooued to a sedition, which to preuent, the * Queene Regent caused an Assembly of the Bishops and Barons, vnto whom the Ministers presented these Articles:

* Mary Daughter to the Duke of Guize.

Articles propounded to Scottish Bishops and Peeres.

1 That their Diuine Prayer and publike Administration of the Sacrament, should be in the English Tongue.

2 That Bishoprickes and other Ecclesiasticall Benefices, should bee bestowed vpon qualified men.

3 That such persons inioying the profits, should performe their duties and preach the Word to the people.

4 That none should be admitted in time to come, into the Ministery, vnlesse his life and learning were answerable to that excellent Calling.

The Scottish Bishops answers.

(14) To the two first, the Bishops alleaging the Customes of the Romane Church, would in no wise consent, leauing euery man at liberty priuately to pray in what language he best liked; and the election of their Bishops to the prescription of the Canon Law, and to the appointment of their Queene. For the two latter, they affirmed, no better order could bee prescribed then that of their Common Law, which imposeth vpon them, asmuch as was required; and thereupon they began to put the same in execution, commanding all that had charge of soules, to fit themselues to their functions, otherwise to looke for no fauour from depriuation, after the terme of sixe moneths. Which was (saith the same Author) the principall cause, that a great number of young Abbots, Priors, Deacons, and Beneficed men, did assist the enterprize, and practised deuices for the ouerthrow of the Catholike Religion.

Many Scottish Abbots, Priors, &c. aduance true Religion.

(15) True it is, that at the preaching of Iohn Knoxe, and other Ministers affecting Reformation, not onely the Images, Altars, and other like things of abuse, were cast downe and burnt, but also the Charterhouse of the Friers at Perth destroyed, which was the faireſt Abbey in the Realme of Scotland: then followed the ouerthrow of the Monasteries of Saint Andrewes, of Stone, of Striueling, and of Linlithaw; which ouerheady proceedings caused such stirres in the Land, that the Lords of the Combination incamped at Cowper, to abide battell against the French (who came into Scotland to impeach their purposes) had not the trauels of some Noblemen preuailed on either part.

Stirres in Scotland, raised by some heady proceedings.

(16) The French King, thus ouer-busie about Scotlands State, was ouer-careleſſe of his owne, when (at solemnizing the marriages of his daughter and sister) he would needs be a Challenger at Tilt, seconded by the Duke of Guize and Ferrara, which triumphant joy was suddenly clowded with a sad Catastrophe. For to runne his last (and indeed his last) course in fauour of his Queene, he sent a Lance to the Earle of Montgomery, with a command to haue him enter the Tilt; but hee excusing himselfe from running against his Majesty, alleaged, that fortune the day before, afforded him not to breake one staffe, and that now (as he feared) shee would put him to a second shame; but the King, destiny so enforcing, and his date fully runne, sent him a second command, which Montgomery very vnwillingly obeyed, and breaking his Lance vpon the Kings Cuiraſſe, a splinter thereof, his Beauer being somewhat open, strucke him so deepe in the eye, that thereupon shortly hee ended his life.

(17) After whose death, Francis his sonne, and second of that name, at the age of sixteene yeeres succeeded him in the Crowne of France; hauing by the marriage of Queene Mary, the Title of Scotland annexed to his others. He hearing of the troubles raised there, in case of Religion, sent Mounsieur de la Broche to strengthen the Field, and the Bishop of Ameans to assist the Queene Regent, with his farre reaching and inseeing councell. Surely, the preparation to withstand them was great, and the Combinators many that stood for Reformation, as namely, one Duke, fourteene Earles, and eleuen Lords, besides other of name and account; but knowing their Aduersaries forces, and seeing those Strangers to possesse diuers of their Townes and Forts, to the oppressing of the Kingdome vnder forraigne subjection, they were inforced to become Petitioners vnto Queen Elizabeth, for aide to expell the French, who sought the subuersion of the Realms state.

For the performance whereof, fiue young Gentlemen were ſent into England; and the Duke of Norfolke into the North, who from Barwicke diſpatched the Lord Gray of Wilton for Generall into Scotland, accompanied with many worthy Captaines, ſixe thouſand foot, and one thouſand two hundred and fiftie horſemen, theſe comming to Salt-Preſton, were ioyfully receiued of the Scottiſh Lords, who there in Councell decreed what was to be done.

(19) From thence they marched toward Leſterike, where a Trumpet from the Queen Regent met them with a ſafe-conduct for Sir Iames Croft, and for Sir George Howard, with ſixe other Gentlemen to accompany them vnto her Preſence in the Caſtle of Edenborough, vnto which the Generall and the Scottiſh Lords agreed, with an abſtinence from Armes during the conference. But the French (the meane-while) vnder the Command of Monſieur Doiſell, iſſued forth of Leith, and in good array tooke the Field: which when the L. Gray perceiued, he ſent an Herald vnto them, willing them to depart till the Engliſh were returned, according to the order betwixt their Regent and him: but they returned him anſwer, they were on their Miſtreſſes ground, which they meant to make good, and thereupon diſcharged a whole volley of ſhot vpon the Engliſh Army.

The French diſturbe the intended parley.

(20) The Alarum thus giuen when leaſt it was expected, a cruell skirmiſh began, wherein died of the French about ſeuenſcore perſons, the reſt were inforced backe into Leith, and many of the Engliſh both hurt and ſlaine. Whereupon they intrenched the Crag, and planted their Ordnance againſt Leith, vpon whoſe Steeples the French had mounted their great Cannons, whence their Bullets flew amaine, and ere long a bold attempt was vndertaken by them, who with fiftie Horſemen, and fiue hundred Harquebuſiers iſſued out of Leith, and aſſayled the Engliſh new trenches with ſuch valour, as they entred; and a while poſſeſſed the ſame; where they tooke Maurice Barkeley priſoner, wonne his Enſigne, cloyed the touch-holes of three great Peeces, and ſlew no ſmall numbers of their reſiſters.

The French aſſaile the Engliſh.

(21) The Engliſh by this time had armed themſelues (for this aſſault was vnexpectedly giuen) and Captaine Vaughan with his, brauely entred the Trench, who being ſeconded by Captaine Sommerſet, Reade, and Arthur Grey, recouered the ſame with ſome ſlaughter of men, the Ordnance from Leith diſcharging vpon them, to the great annoyance of their honourable ſeruice; and now being Maſters of what was late loſt, they cleared the great Ordnance which the French had ſtopped, and caſt a new Trench along by the old Chappell, whence with their great Peeces they beat downe the Steeples of Saint Anthony, and Saint Nicholas in Leith, and diſ-mounted the Peeces that therein lay leuelled againſt them.

The Engliſh recouer their Trenches.

(22) In the full courſe of which diſſentions, the Queene Mother, Regent of Scotland, (a Lady of excellent endowments of minde) conſumed with thoughts, diſpleaſures, and melancholy, departed this life in Edenborough Caſtle: the Lords waxing ſtronger, and Leith much weaker through extremitie of famine, and the French King, (the onely pillar on whom their ſtrength did conſiſt) not able to aſſiſt them. Who being brought daily into feares, through new tumuls ariſing, and increaſed in his owne Countrey of Amboyſe, was forced (ſaith Leſlie) to yeeld vp all the Dominions, both of France, and of Scotland, vnto Pope Pius the fourth, to bee at his command and defence; but his Holineſſe fearing his owne tottering eſtate, like a wiſe man, that meant to warpe no more then he could well weaue, ſuffered King Francis to ſeeke for other redreſſe, which hee did from Her, that was more willing and better able to giue him content.

concluded finally vpon certaine Articles, whereof those that concerned England, were these: That neither the King of France, nor his Queene of Scotland, should thence-forth vse the Armes or Titles of England, or Ireland, and that all Letters sealed with those Armes, should be called in within sixe moneths space; that both the English and French should depart Scotland, some few excepted, employed vpon occasions, and that a generall pardon should be enacted by Parliament, concerning all such as had beene in these stirres. Which Parliament was assembled at Edenborough in August following. These things accomplished, an Ambassage of thankes was solemnly addressed vnto Queene Elizabeth by the Earles of Morton, Glencarne, and the young Laird of Lethington, with proffer that the Earle of Arran, the greatest Lord in account among them, should be at her dispose for marriage, which (as they well hoped) would be to her selfe.

Notwithstanding, Gustabus being dead, Ericus now raigning King of Sweden, hauing imprisoned his brother Iohn, sollicited her Majesty the second time, but to his dishonour as it fell out, for his suite rejected in the English Court, he attempted to match with the youngest daughter of Philip Lantgraue of Hassia, who hearing that he had twice receiued deniall in England, denied him also with some disgrace, giuing his daughter vnto Adolfe Duke of Holst, vncle vnto Fredericke King of Denmarke, at that time enemy to Ericus.

(26) The Peace scarcely was concluded betwixt England & France, when Francis the yong King was taken away by death, and another pupill King crowned, euen Charles his younger brother, and ninth of that name, who was guided altogether by the Regency of the Queene Mother, and molested with the ciuill dissensions betwixt the Princes of Guize and Conde. For whose reconciliation, Qu. Elizabeth sent Sir Henry Sidney, Lord President of Wales, vnto which her endeauours, howsoeuer the French gaue countenance in Court, yet on the Seas they tooke her Merchants ships, imprisoned the men, and seized their goods, no other cause alleaged, but that they were Hugonets.

(27) These misdemeanors Englands great Queene tooke not well; yet did shee not so much blame, as pittie the young and ouer-ruled King, brought to such a straight, that he was neither able to defend the Authoritie of his owne Lawes, nor to vphold the leagues made with other Princes. But most especially the cause of Religion (the onely pretended motiue of all these disturbances) together with the sollicitations of the French themselues (as from Roan, Diep and Newhauen) mooued her Majesty first to set forth her grieuances publikely in Print, and next to send ayde vnto Monsieur Vidame, Captaine of Newhauen, against such as sought to subuert both Religion and the Estate.

(28) These landing in Normandy, were with great joy receiued into the Townes of Newhauen, Roan, and Diep, which were willingly surrendred into the English Queenes possession (the only Cloud-pillar that stood betwixt Gods chosen Israel, and the blood-seeking Amalekites in this wildernesse of Sin,) with this reseruation by the Queene her selfe inserted, No way to prejudice the Kings Soueraigne Authoritie, nor the estate of the Realm; so vpright was She, notwithstanding their late vnjust intruding vpon her Right and Title; and her owne just and ancient Title to those forraine parts, especially to Normandy.

(29) The Generall of these English so sent, was the Lord Ambrose Dudley, Earle of Warwicke, who following his charge before gone to Seas, arriued at Newhauen the nine and twenty of October, where his Commission was proclaimed, & oath taken, vnto whom strengths of Scottish men were sent him from Diepe, whereof Monsieur Montgomery was presently made Gouernour, hauing lost Roan vnto the King of Nauarre; though the vnfortunate King bought the victory with his owne death, as he viewed the weaker parts of the Citie.

(30) To with-stand the English thus settled in Normandy, the Conte Reingraue was sent, and in familiar conference told the Earle of Warwicke, that he was come to bee his neighbour; but prooued indeede so couetous an incrocher, as lastly he dispossessed the Earle of the Towne. For albeit that many manly feates were therein performed by the English, and the place stored with prizals of wines; yet wanting freſh victuall, but eſpecially freſh water, which the enemy had cut off, the calamities were great, and much more augmented by a contagious peſtilence, that ſlew many more then did either famine or ſword; ſo that the Engliſh hauing poſſeſt the Towne for eleuen moneths ſpace, now were conſtrained to ſurrender it vpon compoſition, bringing thence many ſicke Souldiers that dangerouſly infected England with a long continuing plague.

Newhauen ſurrendred. The plague brought into England from Newhauen.

(31) Times motion in England now mooued onely with the benefit of peace, and no Act memorable to commit vnto Hiſtory; let vs ſupply this Interim with looking a little into the ſtate of Religion in France; as wee haue ſeene, and ſomewhat touched the proceedings thereof both in England and Scotland. The Goſpell ſpreading farre in that faire Continent, the impugners tooke occaſions to raiſe many ſtirres, and all in ſhew to race out new hereſies, as they accuſed and called the reformed doctrine. For which cauſe the French Townes burning in the flames of ſeditions, the Proteſtants blood was thought fitteſt to quench them, and the rapines committed vpon chaſte wiues and Virgins, was pretended to bee canceld by a marriage wrought and contracted betwixt two Princes of the blood: which were Henry of Bourbon, Prince of Nauarre, a fauourer of the Goſpell, and Margaret of Valois the third Daughter of King Henry the ſecond, and Siſter vnto King Charles now raigning, a Princeſſe much deuoted to the Romiſh Religion. (32) This match was plotted by the Marſhall of Coſſe, and the Maſter of Requeſts, with the deuice no doubt of ſome in higher place, who wrought the Queene of Nauarre, vnder the pretence of great affection, that the French King bare vnto her; and the Chaſtillon Admirall (a moſt zealous Proteſtant) vnder an intent of imployment for the defence of the Low-Countries, againſt the King of Spaine. This match indeed ſeemed to confirme a publike concord, only the Popes diſpenſation muſt be had, by reaſon of pretended conſanguinity of the parties, the one being Petty Nephew, the other Grandchild of Francis the firſt, King of France. And the Queene of Nauarre made ſome ſcruple of the Ceremonies for the celebration, place, and Church; but ciuill reaſon ouer-ſwaying all difficulties, the Theater muſt be Paris, as the Capital Citie, and the marriage acted without any change of Ceremony, or of royall forme.

(33) Chaſtillon the Admirall was formoſt at Court, where the Papals gaue him place, and to take from him all iealouſie or miſtruſt, the King countenanced him ſo much, that hee repayed his loſſes ſuſtained in the warre, grants him the reuenewes of his brother the Cardinall Chaſtillon, that lately fled and dyed in England, treates with him familiarly, giues him a place in his Priuy Councell, and euer honours him with the plauſible name of Father; inſomuch as the people began to murmure that King Charles not onely fauoured the Hugonites, but was now become a Hugonite himſelfe. And the Admirall for his part thinking all vpright, to that end mooueth the King to treat a Peace with the Queene of England, to the prejudice of the Spaniards: with theſe motiues among others; that Elizabeth was vnmarried, and Henry Duke of Anjou had no wife, the dignitie of ſo high an alliance was honourable for the Duke, and the quality of a Kings brother was not to bee contemned by the Queene; he hauing in his young yeeres purchaſed great honour and reputation.

The Foord thus ſounded by the well-meaning Admirall, ſeemed the more ſafely paſſable: for the two Queenes of England and Nauarre; the firſt of them granting the Peace ſo deſired, and the other without all jealouſie repayred to the French Court; where eighteene dayes after her arriuall, of a quotidian Feuer ſhee dyed, though others ſaid, not without ſuſpition of poyſon, by the perfume of a paire of Gloues preſented vnto her.

with a Harquebusse leuelled out of a window, shot into the left arme, and dangerously hurt. At which traiterous attempt, the King and Queene mother seemed to be greatly perplexed, visiting him with all expedition, and for his further safetie, commanded all his fauourers (the Protestants) to be lodged, neere about him. But the night now approached, Cosseines brake into his Base-Court, and three of his Company entring his Bed-chamber, with their weapons barbarously murthered him, whose goared body at Guizes command, they cast out of the Window, Guize himselfe wiping the blood from his face, acknowledged him to be the man. His head they cut off, and presented to the Queene mother, and shee balming it, sent it to her Holy Father for an assurance of the death of his most capitall enemy.

(36) The Palace Clocke strikes (the Watch-word vnto the Alarum) when the other armed troupes flie to the Admirals lodging, cut off his hands, dragge his martyred Carkasse thorow the streets, and lastly hang it vp by the feet at Montfaucon. And with the like hellish fury the bloody faction, oppressed the Protestants, both in the City and Suburbes, sparing neither sexe, condition, nor age, thorow whose streets nothing was heard but gastly horrour, armes, horses, and death, with the pittifull shrikings of the Innocents, crying (but alasse in vaine) for mercy. On the other side, the shoutes of the murtherers preuailed, saying, that this one day should end the quarrell, which neither Pen, paper, decrees of Iustice, nor open warre for twelue yeeres together could euer doe. Lamentable was the spectacle of those sacred and massacred carkases strewed in the streets, the pauements, Market-places, and Riuers dyed with their blood, and that Sabbath made direfull, and to the Papists infamous, with the bloody pollution of ten thousand Innocents, in the staine whereof we will leaue them, and returne our stile againe for England.

Irish Rebellion vnder Shan (that is) Iohn O-Neale.

(37) As these ciuill seditions were on foot in other parts, so Ireland, too too rebellious, sought vnder the shelter of Shan O-Neale, to shrowd themselues from the obedience of Queene Elizabeths gouernement; a man cruell by nature, and claiming an inheritary right of the Prouince of Vlster, as the O-Neales formerly had done of all Ireland. For in the troublesome times of Robert Brus, when his brother Edward named himselfe King of Ireland, Douenald O-Neale, rowzed out of his lurking holes, in his missiue Letters vnto the Pope, styleth himselfe King of Vlster, and in right of inheritance, the vndoubted Heire of all Ireland. But his glorious shew being clowded before it was seene, his posterity puld in their hornes like snailes, vntill the fire-brands of Ciuill dissentions betwixt the Houses of Lancaster and Yorke gaue light to their footing, whilest the English left Vlster vnto their custody, and followed in England the faction which they best fauoured.

(38) At which time, Henry O-Neale began to bee great, by marrying the Daughter of Thomas, Earle of Kildare; as afterward also his sonne * Con-More O-Neale, marryed the Daughter of Girald Kildare (his Mothers brother) both of those Kildares being Deputies of Ireland. From the bed of these Cousin-germanes, issued Con O-Neale, surnamed Bacco, because he halted; who was so right Irish, that hee cursed all his posteritie, in case they either learned the English language, sowed wheate, or built them Houses, lest the first should breed conuersation, the second Commerce of sustenance, and with the last they should speed as the Crow, that buildeth her nest to be beaten out by the Hawke.

Whose humble submission so satisfied this crowned Bird, that his life was deliuered out of his claw, and Letters Patents granted vnder the Great-Seale of England, to hold his reuenewes in Fee of the King, together with the Title of Earle of Tir-Oen, to him and to Mathew his false reputed sonne, and to the heires of their bodies lawfully begotten, at what time the said Mathew was created Baron of Dungannon.

hatred, as he ſtript him out of Houſe and all, and neuer left, till for want and griefe, the old man pined away.

(41) Shan then choſen, proclaimed, and inaugured O-Neale, by an old ſhoo caſt ouer his head, ſeized vpon his Fathers inheritance, and with all diligence ſought after the ſonnes of Mathew, to ſecure himſelfe of that which hee had got. Brian the eldeſt hee cauſed to bee ſlaine by Mac Donnel Totan, one of the Onealeſ race, but Hugh and Cormack by meanes of the Engliſh eſcaped his hands. Thus ſeated in Vlſter, he began to tyrannize ouer the great men of that Prouince, accounting them his Subjects, as in his anſwers vnto the Engliſh Iuſticiar, expoſtulating with him vpon that point, he laid his Title.

That his ſurrender vnto King Henry of England, was of no validity, conſidering that Con had no longer therein then his owne life, neither could that lawfully be done without the conſent of the Nobles of Vlſter, by whom he had beene elected O-Neale. That himſelfe was by Law both of God and man, the onely true Heire, being the firſt begotten Sonne of his Father, lawfully borne in Wedlocke, choſen, declared and proclaimed O-Neale, by the generall conſent of the Peeres and People of Vlſter, and that according to the ancient Law Taniſtry, whereby a man at his full yeeres is to be preferred before a Boy, and an Vncle before a Nephew, whoſe Grandfather ſuruiued the Father; and laſtly, that he had done nothing, but what he had ſufficient authority to doe, and which his anceſtors had not vſed before him to doe.

(44) Theſe his doings Thomas Earle of Suſſex (the Lord Deputy) ſought to redreſſe, whoſe preparations ſo ſtrangely terrified him, that by the counſell of Girald Earle of Kildare, hee came into England, and caſt himſelfe proſtrate at Queene Elizabeths feet, and vpon his ſubmiſſiue behauiour and promiſed allegeance, with her gracious fauour returned home; where for a while in his diet and apparell, hee conformed himſelfe to all kind of ciuility, yea, & did ſome office of ſeruice in driuing the Scots out of Vlſter, ſlaying their Leader Mac Conel, & in protecting the poorer ſort from the violence and oppreſſions of the Nobles. In which his doings he drew vpon himſelfe their hatreds and complaints; and he whoſe nature could diſgeſt neither, fell furious for reuenge vpon Mac-Guir, Lord of Fermanagh, fired Armach, the Metropolitane Citie, laid ſiege vnto Dundalke, and harried the Countrey on euery ſide.

(48) King Charles but young, and altogether gouerned by the Queene-mother, hauing well learned his leſſon, made preſent anſwer, That Callis was his, and that none had right thereunto but himſelfe, neither ſhould any deliuer it to any other, and that the Treaty, named by the Engliſh Ambaſſadour, did wholly giue it him. Whereunto Sir Thomas replyed, That neither her Majeſty nor Councell did ſo take it, nor indeed could, the words of the Treaty being ſo plaine, and manifeſt. Why, Maſter Smith, quoth the Queene-mother, I maruell the Queene your Miſtreſſe would now ſend for ſuch a purpoſe, and eſpecially you, who knoweth, none better, how all things haue paſſed: you know that your Queene hath forfeited Callis, and all her rights in thoſe places diuers wayes. As firſt, by inuading the Kings Subjects in Scotland, then moſt manifeſtly at New-hauen, where the King, my Sonne, was faine with an whole Army to recouer it; and in the ſaid Treaty was an Article as hath beene diſputed, that if the Queene of England ſhould inuade any part of my Sonnes Dominions, ſhee ſhould forth-with loſe her right in Callis.

King Charles ſpeech to the Ambaſſadors.

Obiections againſt the Queene of England.

(49) Madam, ſaid Sir Thomas, K. Henry and his ſucceſſors were bound to loſe Callis, if they inuaded England, & yet did King Francis, brother to the King here, doe it by the way of Scotland, as is moſt manifeſt, after the ſaid Treaty at Caſteau, not onely in aſſuming the Armes and Title of England & Ireland, but contrary to the Articles of Peace, which concluded that both Engliſh & French ſhould depart Scotland: which incontinently her Maieſty performed, in reuoking thence her Lieutenant, Captaines, and Souldiers: whereas contrariwiſe Monſieur D'oiſell their Chieftaine abode therein ſtill, and the French power daily augmented vnder the conduct of Monſieur de Martigues, and de-la-Broſſe, and alſo by another great Commander, whoſe Nauy was diſperſed by tempeſt, and whoſe ſtrength his ſhip-wracke did teſtifie, in Holland, Zeland, Norway, and Denmarke, by the loſſe of Armour, Men, and Munition: to let paſſe * Britaigne and Normandy, then in preparing to inuade England; and Lantz-knights likewiſe hired in Saxony, and the Land of Lunenburge to aſſiſt the French in that that enterprize, when theſe Almanes according to their nature, loth to take Seas, and deſirous to know whither their ſeruice intended, were told, they ſhould no further then Scotland, and to the Land adjoyning, which was plentifull of Gold, Siluer, and all kind of wealth, and where no Almane Souldier had made ſpoile for the ſpace of an hundred yeeres before; and to ſome of them in plaine termes it was told, that they ſhould into England; which was likewiſe ſignified vnto her Majeſty, both from her neighbour Princes, warning her Highneſſe to take good heed vnto her ſelfe, as alſo by Letters intercepted, that declared their intents; whereof ſhee did not onely admoniſh Monſieur de Seure then Ambaſſador in England for France; but alſo by her Ambaſſador to the French King, praying him to deſiſt from ſuch attempts ſo prejudiciall to her Highneſſe, and ſo directly againſt the treaty of Peace. To colour which matter, the ſaid de Seure made a Proteſtation in Print, the anſwer whereunto is likewiſe Printed in Engliſh, French, Italian, and Latine, wherein may appeare the Hiſtory of that time. And ſince, her Majeſty hath had a more manifeſt proofe by men which are yet aliue. For when the moſt part of the French power was arriued in Scotland, the Queen Mother, Monſieur de Oiſell, and Monſieur de Martigues, called the Scottiſh Lords with their Forces vnto Aimouth, beſides Barwicke; where they declared, that their mind was to inuade England; and to giue to the King and Queene the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh Crowne, of which they now had the Titles and Armories. But the Lords of Scotland vpon conſultation, made anſwer, That they had often attempted to inuade England, but they neuer got any good thereby, further affirming, it was againſt the peace newly cõcluded and ſworne: ſo neere was it to execution. Vpon this there followed a treaty of Peace at Edenborough, wherein the number of French Souldiers were to be leſſened, the Stile and Armes of England left downe, and the treaty of Caſteau renewed and confirmed: all which may appeare by the hands of them which were Commiſſioners, authorized by the French King vnder his Great Seale: which treaty when it was ſigned with all the Commiſſioners hands, the Queen my Soueraigne, for the loue of Peace, being contented to ſeale and ſweare: the ſaid King Francis did refuſe them both, ſith which refuſall her Maieſty doth, and hath alwayes taken that the right of Callis, both propriety and poſſeſſion, was deuolued vnto her by reaſon of the attempt, and hath demanded it diuers times, yet was content to ſtay the time of compoſition; which now being cleerely expired, it muſt needs be hers, and cannot iuſtly be denyed.

The French charged with hard dealings.

The Scottiſh Lords too wiſe to be led by the French.

The French King refuſed to ſweare to the Peace.

(50) Why (ſaid the Queene) all this while you haue ſaid nothing againſt the King my Sonne, why hee ſhould forfeit it; he hath done nothing: and is the bearing of your Armes ſo great a matter with you? You beare the Armes and ſtile of Ours, and ſo doe many beare others Armes alſo. No Madam, ſaid Sir Thomas Smith, the bearing of the Armes is not ſo great a matter, but that with other things doe declare the intent, and the attempt maketh the right forfeited by the treaty. And though the King your Son did not forfeit it, yet the right being once loſt from France, and accrewed to the Queene of England, how ſhould it goe from her againe? All this while (ſaid the Queene Mother) you ſpeake but of the King of Scotland, who did it in his wiues right, and there you muſt aske your amends, and not here; You heare what my Son ſaith, and euery man ſeeth the right is his: your Queene hath forfeited it, and therefore I maruell my good Siſter will ſtand in it, or ſend to demand it. This is the anſwer, ſaid Sir Thomas, which I ſhall carry to the Queen my Soueraigne. That? Nay, ſaid the King, I will talke with my Councell, and then ſhall you haue a reſolute anſwer. Then were the Engliſh Ambaſſadors deſired to abſent themſelues a while, and within an houre after were ſent for againe.

Callis forfeited by couenant.

Monsieur de Valence.

(52) Monsieur de Valence, said the Qu. Mother, I pray you answer that: whereupon he standing vp said, My selfe was sent to that treaty of peace, and am glad to heare Monsieur L' Ambassador confesse that the bearing of the English Armories was but a small matter, and yet was that the chiefest thing imputed by their side: as for the men of war, they were not aboue fiue thousand at the most, sent indeed because of a rebellion (for so must I terme it in plaine termes) then risen there. But the English men were aboue fifteene thousand that came against them at Petty-Lith. There was sent thither also the Bishop of Amiens with the Popes Bulles to reduce them againe to the Religion Romane. And as touching these matters, I spake with your Queene as I came thorow England, and offered her as much at the first as was done in that Treaty, if shee would breake the League betwixt her and the Scottish Lords, which were Rebels. But she said shee could not. Now for the ratification and confirmation of that Treaty which was signed with my hand and others: there should haue come into France certaine Scottish Lords to haue agreed and sworn to certain Articles, which did deferre to come till the King was sore sicke, and could not attend them, who shortly after died, and so the Treaty was not ratified. And he being dead, the King that now is, had nothing to doe to ratifie it: for the matters therein touched Scotland, and their Queens doings and titles, which appertained nothing at all vnto him.

The Romane religiō a chiefe cause of these stirres.

Sir Tho. Smith.

(53) To whom Sir Thomas replied and said, I am not ignorant that the Article saith, Armis innouare, attentare aut moliri, and doe not take Armis to signifie Armories. But the Armes that I meant to weigh the most, and the attempt with them done, was the Armed men, and the good Captaines whom I named D'Oisel, Brosse, Mortigues, & others, their Ensignes and Companies, mary the Armories and Titles did disclose the intent and meaning. And if there had been none other but them which the Bishop brought, and none other munition but the Popes Bulls; Qu. Elizabeth should not haue needed to haue armed so many Shippes, nor sent so many Souldiers to haue let their enterprise, nor would euer haue complained of it: but it was far otherwise as I haue declared. As for the league you speak of with the Rebels of Scotland, I thinke there was none, and the euent did shew what Rebels they were. But this I think, they were as weary to haue so many of you there, as wee were weary to haue you so neere vs. And therin I thinke the Queens Maiesty & they did agree. And to excuse the refuse of the ratification, by the not comming in of the Scottish Lords, hath small reason to beare it: for the Treaty made betweene the French King then, and the Queene of England, might haue beene ratifed notwithstanding, whatsoeuer was betwixt him and the Scottish Lords his Subiects: for our fact and peace did not stand vpon their doings: which Treaty because it was not ratified, I say, the Queene my Soueraignes title to the possession of Callis, by reason of that attempt, standeth whole and entire vnto her. But sir, said he (speaking to the King) to say the truth, I haue no commission, nor any commandement or authority to dispute or answere in these matters, but onely to demand Callis and the other Fortresses, and places according to the Treaty, which is so plaine, that to mine opinion, there need be no controuersie. And if there be any doubt, now the time expired doth put it out of all doubt. But because you and the Queene haue charged me that I know so much of the matter, as I cannot deny somewhat I doe, as hauing beene at the doing of a great deale and the dispute; somewhat I must, and may say for my selfe, lest it should be thought that there were nothing to be said. Mary as I said, as Commissioner from the Queene my Soueraigne, I haue nothing to say, but the demands only, the matter being plaine and in right iudgement, without controuersie, and also that I see no person here but such as bee parties, and no competent person to be Iudge of the controuersie. Whereunto the Constable replyed and saide, Who should bee iudge of that which is the Kings but himselfe? it is his, and none could take or giue it to any other but himselfe. With that the Queene Mother asked Monsieur Chancellier, Why he did not speake.

The Scottish Lords scandalized.

Qu. Mother.

Monsieur Chancellier.

(54) Who after some pause, beganne a long and well composed oration, the sum whereof was this: That the present Kings right to Callis was long before any claime could be made thereunto by the English, which was not much aboue two hundred yeeres, and then was it got by the fortune of warre; but more anciently, that it had been the inheritance of France none can deny, as being being vpon the Continent thereof, & not vpon any Englisſh ground. King Edward (quoth he) wee grant wan it, and your Father noble King rewan it to his Crowne. But the Engliſh will ſay they haue poſſeſſed and inioyed it many yeers: Why ſo they did Aquitaine, Gaſcoigne, and Guyen, and other dominions beſides, which they claimed by our Elenor, the repudiate of the King of France, who was inheritrix vnto it: indeed ſome titles they had, yet ſo, as they held them of the Crowne of France: for the whole, which is Gallia, appertaineth to you ſir our King: and ſo doth Callis, which is of no great antiquity that I can read of: for County Boloigne was the firſt that did incloſe it, being afore but a Burgard, as the moſt part of the Townes of France then were. At the battell of Creſſy, dolorous to vs, King Edward of England after 9. moneths ſiege, by compoſition had it ſurrendred, the poore inhabitants pardoned of life, at the great ſuit of his good Queen, elſe had they died euery mothers ſonne, and ſo with white wands in their hands were expelled the towne: To whom the King of France was ſo mercifull, that he cõmanded of euery thing vacant, they ſhould be the firſt prouided for. And I thinke, when your Father King Henry tooke it, the Engliſh were likewiſe ſo ſerued. Theſe claime two hundred yeeres poſſeſſion, the others before thẽ, aboue fiue hundred yeeres: thus God doth, to puniſh, or to eſſay his ſeruãts. And although the Engliſh claimed Gaſcoigne, & Guyen, by ſucceſſion of Elenor, although Normandy by one William; & Poutieur by a Dowry of their mother, daughter of Philip de Bel; yet to Callis they had no right, but onely by Armes, and by Armes your Father againe recouered it. But ſome will ſay, By the peace at Bretigny, they haue right. I ſay no; for euery man knowes what exceptions were taken at that peace: and ſome, that ſo long a poſſeſſiõ makes a preſcription; I ſay no, for Preſcription is among priuate men, but among Princes, preſcriptiõ cannot ſtand; and yet theirs was not much aboue two hundred, ours aboue eight hundred yeers. But to you Monſieur L' Ambaſſadour, I will ſay, that at the peace of Troes in Champaign, were your ſelfe & Monſieur Throckmorton, both of you moſt able in ſuch affaires and nothing therein done, I doubt not without the Queene and Councels conſent: no one word was ſpoken of Callis, which chiefly was the cauſe of the warre; ſo that all ſtandeth cleere for all which was then talked vpon, and is a plaine confeſſion, that they did acquit their right thereunto. This Article I ſay is tranſlatiuus in the peace of Caſteau in Cambreſis, and is no more, but ſuch as forgetfulneſſe, or becauſe all ſmall things cannot be mentioned in conference. But Callis was the chiefe-point, which being omitted, I ſay, by meaning it was acquitted. But now to your reaſons, Monſieur L' Ambaſſador; the Article for the loſſe of Callis at that treaty was forced in by you the Engliſh, who of all nations bee the moſt wary & circumſpect in making their peaces. Whereupon the Queene of England layeth to vs a ſuſpition, a iealouſie, a coniecture, a geſſe, that a King of France would haue inuaded England. But euery ſuſpition muſt not make a breake: for ſo whenſoeuer any Prince ſhould arme his men vpon iuſt occaſion, his neighbours might ſay it was againſt him. And ſo do you Engliſh lay geſſes againſt the late King Francis the ſecond. But the Queene of England with open face inuaded the Kings Realme, with a goodly pretence to keepe the Townes to the Kings vſe, yet when all was reduced into their due obedience, ſhee would keepe the Towne of Newhauen as a pledge for Callis, by which deed ſhe hath loſt all her right in Callis: God indeed hath made a naturall ſeparation betwixt you and vs, a ſure wall of defence, Et penitus toto diuiſos orbe Britannos: So that naturally you ought to haue nothing but peace and amitie with ours. But doe not thinke, Monſieur L' Ambaſſador, thãt I ſay this as fearing what you can doe, for there was neuer any King of France ſince Charleman, ſo great as the King is now, had ſo many men of warre, ſo ready, and ſo good Souldiers: and yet his Highnes doth deſire the amity of the Queene of England, and the loue of that nation: of which there is the more hope, if all theſe pretences and demands were cancelled, and Callis forgotten, which hath beene the continuall picke-quarrell betwixt theſe two Realmes. You neuer read, Monſieur Smith, that the French euer inuaded England: I ſpeake it not to your diſpraiſe which are Engliſh, but to your praiſe; yet this I thinke, had there not beene ſo eaſie a deſcent, ſo conuenient a place, and ſo ready for you to make warre here, yee would not (as I ſuppoſe) haue come hither ſo often and troubled our Country, nor the amity betwixt you and vs; And I dare boldly affirme and gage any thing, that the Queene of England ſhall gaine more by continuall peace with vs, then ſhee ſhall doe by Callis; and therefore your Queene muſt leaue off theſe demands and quarrels, and come to a perfect peace with vs, which ſhall be more profitable for both the Realmes: and this I dare aſſure you, here is no Councellor among vs, that dare once open his mouth to render you Callis; for my part, I will not be one to moue or aſſent thereunto. Nor I, ſaid the Conſtable, and ſo all the reſt.

(55) Then

Sir Thomas Smith.

(55) Then, quoth Sir Thomas Smith, Monsieur Chancelier, mee thinkes you fetch your Title very farre to haue Callis, and howsoeuer the possession was come by, by and by the right is his in possession, then by your reason all our disputation is in vaine, and it maketh no matter, bonáne an mala fide possideat, the King once in possession, as a thing returning to his primer estate postliminio or gotten of the enemy, yee admit no contract, or latter treaty, so as it doth appeare, yee open that which was thought of some men, and alwaies spoken, that what promise soeuer was made, the French would neuer render Callis againe to the English, but keepe it still, per ius, nefasque: this reasoning passeth all answer, for whatsoeuer the Queene of England had done quàm Sanctè, so euer she had kept her treaty of this eight yeeres, though he could obiect nothing against her, yet she should neuer haue had Callis restored; to this kinde of reasoning and to that, that no man dare mooue the King to render it being due, I cannot answer; but to this that toucheth my fact in the making of the Peace in Champaigne, where I must confesse, and am not ashamed, that I was a Minister, I doe not yet acknowledge that either I am worthy to bee accounted so wise as you would make mee, nor our Nations alwaies so circumspect in making Treatises with you, your own Writers auerring otherwise, and giue you the praise therein against vs. But for the point wherein you touch vs, that the peace at Troes should bee nouatio contractus, and wee should thereby acquit our right of Callis, it is Antistrophon, and turneth a great deale better vpon you. For if, because our talke was of our right to Callis, by reason of the attempt in Scotland, you of the forfeiture of it by reason of the descent to Newhauen, neither condiscending to other, and not concluding thereupon, we did agree vpon that Peace. And if that Peace doth make nouationem, then the forfeiture of our right by keeping Newhauen, which you impute to vs, is wiped away, nouated and cleansed by this Peace, & our right which was not yet in esse, & cuius dies nondum venit, remaineth still. So as it toucheth you rather then vs: and by this meanes haue you nothing to say against vs, but wee still our right against you. But the truth is, as Monsieur Le Conneſtable here can tell, who was partly the occasion that we came to it; for when this was contended, that Callis was already due vnto vs, you, that we had forfaited it, so that we could enter into no other Article of peace. Why said you; haue not we the wit to make a peace, and make no mention of Callis? neither to speake of it one way, nor other: your time is not yet come to aske it, let vs liue in peace in the meane-while, and let each Prince haue right such as it is, reserued; whereupon you Monsieur L' Ambespine were one of the first that came with vs, and you know what passed.

The French all for themselues, whatsoeuer they said.

The French the cause that Callis was not mentioned in the Peace.

(56) Yea (saith hee) but wee would neuer grant that it should bee put in, that you should haue Callis. You say true (said Sir Thomas) nor we, that the Queenes Maiesty should acquit it, nor the hostages neither. But in the end when it came to the Conclusion, as the Bishop of Orleans, and Monsieur Bourdin can tell, it was agreed, that expressly the right be reserued, as well to that, as to any other thing, not expressly there mentioned: Omnes aliæ petitiones & demandæ & similiter exceptiones, & defensiones, as appeareth by the Treatie. And as touching Newhauen, Monsieur Chancelier, note in it two things: The one, the first entry, the other, the keeping, after the peace agreed vpon amongst your selues. As for the first entry, I deny that our men of warre made any inuasion, or came by force: But being requested and desired aide of a great number of Noblemen, and other who were in perill and danger. And whether did they like inuaders (I aske for all the time that they were not assailed) spoile any, or robbe any? no, they tooke not an henne or an egge, but they paid for it: I, if any complaine, I offer to pay it: This is no inuasion, nor no hostility: but the act of a friend, and at their requests and pursuits, whose doings sir, aswell for matter of Armes, as for other things done in that tumult, you haue declared by Edict, to haue beene done á bon fin et pour vostre seruice, which may truly bee said, for by their meanes and defence, a great number of your good Subiects aswell men as women, aswell Captaines as Souldiers, of whom Monsieur le Chancelier did now boast, as of other not Souldiers, are saued now to doe you seruice, which else should haue beene a prey and spoile to them which sought but the ruine of halfe or third part at the least of your Realme. For the conseruation of whom, yee in part may thanke the Queene my Mistresse. And this for the first descent of our men. Now where Monſieur Chancelier ſaith, that the Queene my Miſtreſſe changed her pretence, I ſtill doe ſay ſhee kept her firſt proteſtation: That Shee would appropriate no Land Towne, nor Fortreſſe of the Kings to Her, nor Shee did neuer claime Newhauen as Hers, but comming peaceably into it, hauing been at great charge and coſt, it was both wiſdome and reaſon, all other being ſatisfied and content, ſhee ſhould at the leaſt haue ſome reaſon offered her in her right to Callis. And otherwiſe ſhee did not hold Newhauen, which thing was manifeſtly declared at Gallion, where Articles were drawne not vnreaſonable, and the matter ſo farre forward, that they were ſigned with my hand, and tarried but for power and Commiſſion to affirme them. But the mortalitie and peſtilence growing ſo great in Newhauen, gaue too much aduantage, which was taken; and the reaſonable dealings in this matter broke off; other meaning her Majeſtie had none.

(57) No, ſaid the Conſtable, what meant ſuch preparation, and prouiſion? I cannot skill of things; but in that Art wherein I haue beene brought vp and exerciſed all my life, I can skill a little. There was ſuch a number of Horſe-harneſſe for the Cart: ſuch a number of Artillery, ſuch prouiſions of Gammons of Bacon, Cheeſe, and other things, and aboue fiue thouſand men, that am I ſure went out of it, beſides all thoſe that were dead: can you make me beleeue that all this was for Newhauen alone? No Monſieur (ſaid he) I know what belongeth to a Towne of Warre. Yea, ſaid another, and the Ships alſo that came. Nay, ſaid the Conſtable, they came too late. Why, ſaid the Queene-mother ſmiling, will you make vs beleeue that all that preparation was for Newhauen alone?

(58) Wiſedome would, Madam, quoth Sir Thomas Smith, becauſe the ſea and winde doe not ſerue at all times, that there ſhould be good ſtore of all manner of prouiſion. No, no (ſaid ſhee) there was a further meaning, but as you haue quitted Newhauen, ſo muſt you quit Callis, and let vs be friends; neuer talke more of theſe demands, nor of the ſummes of money for which yee had Hoſtages. All is gone from you quite. Your Queene in comming to Newhauen, hath quitted all. Shee muſt forget that matter cleane, and let vs be friends ſtill. The King my ſon doth offer as much friendſhip as need to bee, but as for Callis, ye muſt neuer ſpeake of it. It is hard, Madam, ſaid Sir Thomas Smith, for a man to forget his right, or not to remember a wrong offered. Nay, no wrong, ſaid ſhee, you haue heard what Monſieur Le Chancellier hath ſaid, and what all theſe of my ſonnes Councell doe ſay. Madam (quoth he) it is for the moſt part ſeene, that men be partiall in their owne cauſes: I doe aſſure you, that the Queene my Soueraigne doth thinke that ſhe hath as good right to Callis as to any Towne in England: and ſo doe all her Councell: and whatſoeuer ye haue heard, I am able to ſay for Her right euen out of hand, but they a great deale more. But Sir, quoth Sir Thomas, is this the finall Anſwer I ſhall haue? Yea ſaid the King. That yee will not render Callis vnto her Majeſtie according to the Treaty, nor pay the fiue hundred thouſand Crownes, which is for the peine.

(59) No, ſaid the King, I will keepe them both according to the Treaty: well then ſaid Sir Thomas, I haue no more to ſay, but to bring this report to her Maieſty, which I ſhall be ſorry to doe: and thereupon himſelfe, and Sir Henry Norris, roſe vp to depart, doing their obeiſance. But you take not your leaue, Monſieur L'ambaſſadors, for altogether, ſaid the Queene. Yes forſooth, ſaith Sir Thomas. Doe you intend to come no more at Court? No Madam, except the Kings Maieſty doe command me. But I am ſorry to carry this anſwer ſo preciſe; and that there is ſo little regard of the Queene my Soueraignes right. No right, ſaid the Queene, for if there were any, the King my ſonne would be loth to offer her any wrong: yee haue heard all the reaſon, I maruell that you will take vpon you, you that are learned, to defend ſo vniuſt a cauſe. Ah Madam (ſaid he) I ſee well, it is true on your part, that men bee blind in their owne cauſes and aduantages. Surely (quoth ſhee) the Queene (my good Siſter) ſhall haue more aduantage thus as it is, then to demand Callis. And I pray you perſwade her. I Madam, againſt her right? You muſt not ſay ſo, I pray you commend me heartily to the Queen, my good Siſter, & deſire her to keepe the amity and loue which is betwixt her & my ſonne, and I ſhall be ready to doe her what ſeruice or pleaſure I can, quoth the Queene: and ſo ſaid the King. Thus this conference ended, and Callis kept ſtill by the French.

(60) Now as theſe diſtaſtures fell betwixt England and France, and theſe broken Couenants miniſtred occaſions to ſet each againſt others: So at the ſame time, the affaires of Scotland were carried with ſo violent a motion, as ſet the Lords at diſſentions, & the land in ciuill ſedition; ſo so as not only outrages were committed vpon the best Subiects, but euen vpon the vertuous King and Queene themselues; him they shamefully murthered in a most barbarous maner, and her they tooke prisoner, forced her to resigne gouernment, and lastly to flie into forraine parts for succour. But knowing that this Subiect is to be writ with a farre more noble pen, and our extant relations from vncertaine and suspected reports, wee will surcease to intermeddle in the particulars of that Queenes affaires, excepting onely in such entercourses of State, as are wouen in ours, and cannot otherwise be auoided without maime of History; this onely in generall.

The King of Scots barbarously murthered.

(61) Mary Queene of Scotland hauing imbarked her selfe for France, where she well hoped to finde many friends; by contrary winds (accompanied with sixteene persons) landed at Werkinton in Cumberland, and from thence was conueied to Carlile, to Bolton Castle, & lastly to the custody of the Earle of Shrewesbury. Whose troubles and misfortune, Q. Elizabeth both pittied and sought to redresse, writing in her behalfe vnto the Regent of Scotland, & blaming the Lords of the many wrongs done to their Qu. which indeed were intolerable to royall authority, and such, as other Princes could not but seeke to redresse, and reuenge; notwithstanding such was the distasture of those distempered Lords, or the frownes of those fatall times, that in England shee remained euer after during her life.

Queen Mary of Scotland arriues in England.

Queene Elizabeth solliciteth the Scots in her behalfe. Bucha. lib. 19.

(62) As the iealousies grew great betwixt these two great Queens, Elizabeth & Mary, by the working instruments of the Pope, and forraine Princes; so by the like meanes, were the like discontents bred and nourished in some of the greatest English Peeres towards their Soueraigne, whose Peace, vnder pretext of Religion, they irreligiously disturbed. Among these, the first in ranke, time and disloialtie, were the two Earles of Northumberland and Westmerland, who with Leonard Dacres, Neuill, Norton, Tempest, Danby, and others, purposed on the sudden to haue surprized the Earle of Sussex, the Q. Lieutenant of the North, in his house at Cawood; but therin preuented, they were enforced to keep secret their intents, till some fit occasion should chance to be ministred. They had in readinesse against the rising, certaine English Priests, Morton and others, with Bulles & instruments of absolution, reconciliation, and taking of Oathes to the Pope and his doctrine, which was not so secretly done, but that Q. Elizabeths vigilant Councellors had an inkling therof.

Rebellion with Papall Bulles.

(63) Thomas Percy; so was Northumberlands Earle named) lying at his Castle of Topclife in Yorkshire, had gone so far in his intended purposes, as he could not returne; who beeing sent for vnto the Court, strucke great amazement & sudden feare into the other conspirators hearts: and his owne guilty minde was much more distracted, vpon notice that some forces were approching for his apprehension; whereupon all affrighted, he rose from his bed, and caused the Bels to bee rung in a most confused manner, so that the Townesmen raised, al sought to defend and follow him their chiefe Lord.

An. Dom. 1569. The Earle of Northumberland sent for to the Court, strengtheneth himselfe. Nouemb. 14.

(64) The nest thus broken before the birds could well flie, hee departed to Branspeth, where hee met with Charles Neuill Earle of Westmerland, and his following consorts; who ioyning in counsell, made no conscience to vndoe many true subiects, and innocent men: For abusing the Queens name in their Proclamations & Commissions, they commanded the Country to follow them in Armes; sometimes pretending the safety of her Maiesties person in danger (they said) by Treasons in working; and sometimes in case of Conscience for restoring their former Religion, which if themselues should neglect, other forraine Princes (said they) would doe, to the no little perill of the Realme.

The pretences of the Rebels.

(65) In this zeale they hasted to Durham, with as forward an intent as Ieroboã did to Bethel, to set vp his golden Calues, where they rent and tare the Bible, in as great a contempt, as Ioachim did the rowle that Ieremy wrote: at Darington they besprinkled their hoast with holy water, for feare of spirits, and at Rippon heard Masse, to forward their Treason, with the assistance of that Propitiatory Sacrifice. Whence, with Banners displaied, they entred Borowbrigge, old Norton being their Ancient, whose Ensigne was the Crosse, & fiue wounds of our Lord.

(66) From thence they went to Tadcaster, Wetherby, and Bramham Moore, where they mustered sixteene hundred Horsemen, and foure thousand footemen, intending therewith to march vnto Yorke. But their mindes altering, they fell vpon Barnards Castle, which after

* The Dutcheſſe of Ferrara, &c.

(67) Theſe things diuulged, and their rebellions ſtill going on, Proclamations came forth, denouncing them Traitors to their Queene and Countrey; and the Lord Scroope Warden of the West-Marches, with the aſſiſtance of the Earle of Cumberland, and other Gentlemen of the Country, kept the Caſtle of Carlile, while Sir Iohn Foſter Warden of the Middle-Marches, accompanied with Sir Henry Percy, exerciſed their manly reſiſtance againſt theſe proud Rebels.

They are proclaimed Traitors.

The Earle of Suſſex leades againſt the Rebels.

(68) To withſtand their ſtill-growing outrage, Thomas Earle of Suſſex (her Maieſties Lieutenant Generall of the North) gathered ſome forces; whoſe Lieutenant for the footmen was Edward Earle of Rutland: and for the Horſemen, was Henry Lord Hunſdon, Lord Warden of the Eaſt-Marches, William Lord Eure leading the rereward. Theſe followed the enemy to North Allerton, Croftbridge, Akle, Durham, Newcaſtle and Hexam, euen cloſe at their heeles; whoſe power was ſo weake, and purſe ſo empty, (being defrauded of an hundred thouſand Crownes, promiſed them by the Pope to maintaine the Rebellion) as that thoſe Rebellious heads entred conference with Edward Dacres at Nawarth, of their deſperate eſtate, being both moneleſſe and powerleſſe to withſtand the puiſſance of the Lord Generall, now on their backes, as alſo the Earles of Warwicke, and Lincolne, the Lords Ferrers, Willowby, and Howard, approaching very neere them, euen at Borow-brigges. No other ſuccour their conſultations could pitch on, then by flight into Scotland, vnto thoſe Lords that there ſtood out for the Romiſh.

His Holineſſe promiſeth treaſure to aduance the Rebellion. The Rebels deſperate eſtate.

The chiefe Rebels fly into Scotland.

(69) So the night following they put it in practiſe, not bidding their intrapped traine once farewell, which as ſheepe without a ſhepheard, ſtood gazing at their owne deſtructions, whileſt Suſſex ſurprized them without any reſiſtance. Vpon whoſe Ringleaders, Iuſtice ſo ſeized, that at Durham dyed, by Marſhall Law, an Alderman, a Prieſt, and ſixty ſixe Conſtables, and in the Country for a great Circuit, a great number of ſuch as were forwardeſt in the Action.

The remaining Ringleaders executed.

(70) Not warned by theſe ſucceſſes (which vſually proue vnhappy, in ſuch diſloyall attempts) Leonard Dacres of Harleſey beganne to gather head againe; whoſe aiders were the more reſolute, in reuenge of their friends executed; and women alſo became ſtout Souldiers in quarrell of their husbands, all forward enough; and too forward to miſchiefe. Theſe vpon a Moore neer vnto Nawarth, to impeach the Lord Hunſdon that made thitherward; had ſet downe their battell in a triangle forme, where they continued a long and moſt deſperate conflict, but in the end were forced to giue backe, and Dacres to flye from his ſlaine, wounded, and ſcattered people, towards Scotland, the then-Refuge of Traiterous transfugers.

An. Dom. 1570. Febru. 22. The Rebels embattell themſelues.

(71) Scotland thus harbouring thoſe diſloyall Engliſh, and their owne Lords diuided into ſeuerall factions, ſome of them ſought to conceale, and ſome to apprehend theſe guilty Earles; ſo that Weſtmerland was ſhifted away into Flanders, but Northumberland, taken by the Regent, and committed to Cuſtody, was afterwards ſent into England, where hauing beene attainted by Parliament, vpon the twenty two of Auguſt was beheaded at Yorke: vſing liberty of ſpeeches, in auowing the Popes Supremacy, denying ſubiection vnto his Soueraigne Qu. affirming the Realme to be in a Schiſme, and her obedient Subiects, no better then Heretickes. Charles Weſtmerland his cõſort, a perſon vtterly waſted by looſeneſſe of life, euen by Gods iuſt iudgement, in the time of his rebellion, was bereaued of children, and afterwards wandring in forraine parts, had his body eaten with vlcers of lewd cauſes, as is moſt conſtantly reported. But from theſe temporall proceedings (being the Domeſticke effects of a forraine cauſe) let vs a while behold the ſpirituall flouriſh of the Popes leaden ſword, vnſheathed at Rome, to enſpirit and enflame ſuch traiterous diſpoſitions againſt Englands Queene.

The ſame in Engliſh.

The declaratory ſentence of the Vniuerſall Biſhop, Pope Pius the fift, againſt Elizabeth the pretended Queene of England, and againſt the Heretikes that take Her part.

Wherein alſo all Her ſubjects are declared to be abſolued from the Oath of Allegiance, and any other duty whatſoeuer, and beſides, they that doe obey Her, are pronounced accurſed.

Pius the ſeruant of the ſeruants of God, for remembrance hereof in time to come.

(74) He that raigneth aboue, to whom is giuen all power in Heauen and Earth, hath committed in fulneſſe of power to be gouerned, one holy Catholike and Apoſtolike Church (where-out is no ſaluation) to one onely in Earth, namely, Peter the Prince of the Apoſtles, & to the Romane Biſhop the Succeſſor of Peter. And him alone hath he made Chiefe ouer all Nations and Kingdomes, who may root out, deſtroy, ſcatter, waſte, plant, & build: that the faithfull people knit together with the band of mutuall Charity, might be kept in the vnity of the Spirit, & preſented in health and ſafety vnto their Sauiour. For the vndergoing of which office, we being called by the goodneſſe of God to the gouernment of the ſaid Church, doe refuſe and omit no paines, labouring by all meanes, that this vnitie and Catholike Religion (which the Author thereof for the triall of the faith of thoſe that bee his, and for our correction and amendment, hath ſuffered to be toſſed with ſo great afflictions) might bee preſerued whole and entire. But the number of the wicked hath ſo much increaſed in power, that now there is no place in the World left, which they haue not attempted to corrupt by moſt wicked Doctrine; among the reſt, Elizabeth the ſeruant of ſinfulneſſe, the pretenſed and vnlawfull Queene of England, with whom, as in a Sanctuary, the moſt wicked perſons of all doe finde a refuge. This Queene, ruling the Kingdome, and monſtrouſly vſurping to her ſelfe the place of the ſupreme Head of the Church throughout all England, and the chiefe authoritie and iuriſdiction of the ſame, hath reuoked againe to a miſerable ruine this very Kingdome, which was in a manner recouered againe to the Catholike faith, and good deuotion. For the vſe of the true Religion (which the moſt lawfull Queene, Mary of famous memory, by the helpe of this Seat had repayred, being before by the Apoſtata, Henry the eighth, ouerthrowne) now by ſtrong hand reſtrained, and the errours of Heretikes imbraced and followed, Shee hath remooued the Councell of State that conſiſted of the Engliſh Nobilitie, and fild the ſame with obſcure hereticall fellowes; Shee hath oppreſſed the Profeſſors of the Catholike faith, and hath ſet vp wicked Preachers and Miniſters of impieties; Shee hath aboliſhed the Sacrifice of the Maſſe, Prayers, Almes, difference of meate, ſingle life, and Catholike rites;

rites; She hath commanded Books to be ſet forth containing manifeſt Hereſie, and her ſelf vſing & obſeruing wicked Rites & Inſtitutions, according to Caluins preſcription; hath alſo commanded them to be obſerued by her Subiects; She hath preſumed to caſt out Biſhops of Churches, Rectors, & other Catholike Prieſts, from their Churches and Benefices, and to diſpoſe of them and other Eccleſiaſticall liuings among Hereticall men; preſuming alſo to iudge of Church matters; Shee hath forbidden the Prelates, the Church and People, that they ſhould not acknowledge the Romane Church, nor that they obey his Precepts and Canonicall Iniunctions; Shee hath compelled many to yeeld to her wicked lawes, and to forſweare and abiure the authority and obedience of the Romane Biſhoppe, and to acknowledge her by their Oath, the onely Gouernour in temporall and ſpirituall matters; ſhee hath impoſed penalties and puniſhments vpon thoſe which were not obedient to her command, and hath exacted the like vpon them which perſeuered in the vnity of the Faith, and in the aforeſaid obedience; She hath caſt into Priſon the Catholike Gouernours and Rectors of Churches, where many, laden with daily languiſhings and ſorrow, haue wofully ended their liues. All which things, foraſmuch as they are notorious and manifeſt to all Nations, and ſo approued by the moſt graue teſtimony of very many, that no way is left them for excuſe, defence, or euaſion: Wee moued by the impieties and miſchiefes that more and more multiply, beſides the grieuances of the faithfull, the affliction of Religion which groweth dayly more intolerable, by the meanes and working of the ſaid Elizabeth, whoſe minde is ſo hardned and indurate, that ſhee hath not onely contemned the godly Prayers and admonitions of Catholike Princes for her health and conuerſion, but alſo hath not ſuffered the meſſengers of this See to come into England to her about this buſineſſe; We, I ſay, moued by theſe cauſes, haue of neceſſity betaken our ſelues to the weapons of Iuſtice againſt her, not being able to refraine from griefe and ſorrow, that we muſt needes puniſh ſuch a One, whoſe Anceſtors haue ſo well deſerued of the Common-weale, and of all Chriſtendome. Being therfore ſtrengthned with his authority, who hath pleaſed to ſet vs in this Supreme Throne of Iuſtice, though vnfit for ſo great a burthen, we by the fulneſſe of our Apoſtolike power, doe declare the foreſaid Elizabeth an Hereticke, and a maintainer of Heretickes, and thoſe that take her part in the things aforeſaid, to haue incurred the ſentence of Anathema, and to bee cut off from the vnity of Chriſts Body. And moreouer, that ſhee is depriued of the pretenced right of her ſaid Kingdome, and alſo from all Rule, dignity, and preeminence whatſoeuer, and alſo her Nobility, Subiects, and People of the ſaid Realme, and all other which haue ſworne vnto her, by any manner of meanes, are abſolued for euer from ſuch Oath, and from all duty of Empire, fidelity, and obedience, in ſuch ſort as wee doe abſolue them by the authority of theſe preſents, and depriue the ſaid Elizabeth of the pretenced right of the Kingdome, and of all other things aforeſaid. And wee doe command and forbid all and ſinguler of the Nobility, Subiects, People, and other aforeſaid, that they preſume not to obey her admonitions, commands, nor lawes. Whoſoeuer ſhall doe otherwiſe, we doe enwrap them in the like curſe. And becauſe it were too difficult a matter to beare theſe preſents to euery place where there is need, we will that the Copies of them being ſigned with the hand of the publike Notary, and the Eccleſiaſticall Prelate, or with the Seale of his Court, haue the ſame credit and authority in Court, and without it, with all Nations euery where, that the preſents themſelues ſhould haue if they were exhibited. Giuen at Rome at Saint Peters, in the yeere of the Incarnation of our Lord, 1569. the fifth of the Calends of March, and of our Papacy the fifth.

The chiefe of either in this place, (omitting the order of Annales) that they may ranke together without interruption of better narrations, and not infect the paper in more places then one, I will here lay downe; aſſuring my ſelfe, that many more more attempts were plotted, then euer were displayed. For the thunderbolt of curses throwne from that Iupiter of Rome, denounced her Maiestie vncapable either of Crowne or Kingdome, tooke such rootes in the hearts of these Locusts, that they both armed themselues openly to battell, and secretly sought to imbrue their barbarous hands in their Princes blood.

Apoca.

(76) For this Brutish Bull, calued in the Popes Consistory (or rather Cowhouse) and now able to trauell from Rome; in London, and at the West end of Pauls, first put forth his hornes, being there hung vpon the Bishops Palace Gate, by a lewd person imployed as an Herauld from the Pope. Moreton an old English fugitiue, (as hath beene said) had procured it: brazen-faced Sanders in his writings maintaineth it, Bristow in his Motiues approued it, Northumberland and Neuil had put it in practice, Iohn Felton had diuulged it, the two Nortons supported it, and many after-followers affaid to execute it; all which, like Serpents bite the bosomes wherein themselues lay, but neuer could hurt Her, the Lords beloued, and holy Anointed, who in peace and glory came to her graue, in a full age, as a ricke of Corne into the Barne in due season.

(78) But more dangerous were those Conspirators, which secretly plotted to bring in forraine powers, or publikely by their writings animated men thereunto, defaming the faire face of Englands Religion, and deforming the body of Elizabeths Gouernment; in which kinde Sanders and Bristow, two English fugitiues, were the Iannes and Iambres that withstood Moses; men of corrupt mindes, and enemies to the Faith; Traytors, heady, and high-minded, hauing a shew of godlinesse, but denying the power thereof, as the Apostle propheſied, that in the last dayes such should arise: both of them approuing Pius Quintus his proceeding about her Maiesties depriuation, and iustifying the wicked in their Rebellions, contrary to the Doctrine of that Apostle, whose Chayre they pretend to vphold. From which sinke of iniquity, issued those corrupt streames, that became bitter as wormwood, the taste whereof brought many to their vntimely, but wel-deserued deaths: among whom, first was Felton, the two Nortons, Kenelme Barne, and Edmund Mather; not long after whom, followed Doctor Story, who may not bee forgotten in our Story.

Iustice executed vpon certaine Traytors.

(79) This man by birth was English, though an Alien in heart, by Profession a Ciuilian, and Doctor of the Canon Law, a persecutor of Gods Saints in the dayes of the last Queene, and in this Queenes raigne, a turbulent inueigher against the Religion established in the English Church. For which being apprehended and cõmitted to Prison, he found meanes of escape, & in Antwerpe receiued Commission vnder Duke D' Alua, to search all Ships cõming thither, for English Books; not forgetting his tyranny wherin he had been trayned, nor to further traiterously many and great attempts to bring in forraine powers for Englands ouerthrow. But the pit that he digged, hee fell into himselfe, and the destruction prepared for others, light on his own pate: for one Parker, an English Merchant, loyally affected to his Prince, trading to Antwerpe, laid his snare faire to catch this foule Bird; causing secret notice to bee giuen vnto Story, that in his Ship were store of Hereticall Bookes, with other intelligences, which might stand him in stead.

(80) The Canonist conceiuing that all was Cocke-sure, hasted to execute his Commission himselfe, where with looks very bigge vpon the poore Mariners, each Cabbin, Chest, and Corner, aboue boord were searched, and some things found to draw him further on; so that the Hatches must be opened, which seemed to be vnwillingly done, and great signes of feare were shewd by their faces. This drew on the Doctor to descend into the Hold; where now in the Trap, the Mouse might well gnaw, but could not get out: for the Hatches went downe, and the Sayles hoysed vp, which with a merry gale were blowne into England, where ere long hee was arraigned, and condemned of high Treason, and accordingly was executed at Tyborne, as hee had well deserued.

(81) To the like end came Sherwin, Campion, Kirby, with others, seditions Trumpetters of this infamous Bull, and Sanders the Irish Legate, the greatest maintainer of his goaring authoritie, though he escaped the Barre of Iustice, yet was found out by a rauing Phrensie, as he wandred succourlesse in the waste Mountaines of Ireland, wherein lastly hee miserably dyed. But to leaue these poysonous Tongue-men and libellous Pen-men, to register their owne shame, and seare their consciences with the brand of sin; let vs discouer those other daring and swording Monsters, who actually imployed themselues to lay either violent hands vpon her Maiesties person, or the Land open to forraigne Inuasions.

(82) The first of them (or first manifested) was Iohn Sommeruile of Elstowe in Warwickeshire, a furious young man, who like a tempest that threatned destruction, came ragingly forward towards the Court, with intent to murther the Queen; the progresse of which attempt summarily was thus: Keeping his Whitsontide with Arden, (his Wiues Father) hee was there so wrought by Hall a Seminary Priest, as he conceiued a desperate rage against her Maiesty, holding it a matter (seeing there was no hope of alteration during the life of the Queene) meritorious to make her away; to which bloody resolution, he was further instigated by his wicked wife. Whereupon returning home, hee grew much perplexed, hauing many feares and conflicts in himselfe, which caused his Wife to write vnto Hall, to come and strengthen the man with firmer resolutions. But he, busied else-where with the like purposes, by Letter excused his not comming, yet therein aduised him to goe forward, promising he would assist him with his prayers to God for his good successe.

But Sommeruile discouered by the way, was indited in Warwicke, and those his Associates condemned of high Treason in London; Sommeruile confessing his intent, said, that hee had beene mooued thereunto by his wicked spirit, and by the inticements of certaine seditious persons, his Kinsmen and Allies, together with the often reading of pernicious Bookes, published against her Maiesty. This desperate Ruffian committed to Newgate after his condemnation, most desperatly strangled himselfe to death; an example of Gods seuerity against such sonnes of disobedience.

(94) Not warned by these, William Parry (as he named himselfe) a man of a profuse wastfulnesse, ryot, and prodigalitie, hauing consumed two Widowes wealths, and wounded his Creditor, by committing Burglary, was for the fact condemned to die, but sued and obtained his pardon of life by the compassioned mercy of Queene Elizabeth, which he, vngratefull man, sought to requite, by vowing her death, that saued him from his. For trauelling into forraine parts, and there obtaining the title of a Ciuilian Doctor, he fell from his naturall alleagiance (as riotous Male-contents vsually doe) and reconciled himselfe vnto the See of Rome, then hauing frequent acquaintance and conference with certaine Iesuiticall Priests, was finally inspired with a hellish resolution to kill her, who had giuen him life.

Parry formerly had his life by the Queenes pardon.

(95) Whereunto hee was further instigated by Benedicto Palmio, a Father Iesuite, Christofero de Salazar, Secretary to the Catholike King, and Thomas Morgan an English Fugitiue, Annibal à Codreto his Confessor, approouing the diuellish designe; and Ragazzoni the Popes Nuntio, promising that this Catholike seruice should bee remembred at their Altar. Two things were yet wanting, to strike vp this Catastrophe, which were, the Popes Approbation, and his Absolution from all his sins: to procure which, Cardinall Como was imployed, who so effectually followed the businesse, that both were shortly procured, and sent him into England, with a Warrant to proceed in his Holinesse Name.

(96) Thus armed frome Rome, his promises on Earth, and his vowes in Heauen, the worke seemes meritorious, and the Queene must dye: to effect which, no fitter way could bee found, then to faine himselfe a false Traytor indeed. For hauing priuate accesse to her presence, was heard at large, that he was the man who had vndertaken her death, which to sound the deepe waters, and to beare sayle with the fairest, he promised to doe, with no intent, as he constantly affirmed, to act that imposed charge, but onely to discouer those who laid for her life. Her Highnesse (whose piercing vnderstanding was not easily blinded, or beguiled with words) seemed so doubtdoubtfully to interpret his confeſſed fact (which yet ſhee kept ſecret from her neereſt Councellors) that hee in great feare departed; as how can a conſcience ſo clogged, but feare? Whereupon his late Letter from Como he ſhewed; which ſeeming alſo to be little eſteemed, and his ſuit to be Mr. of St. Katherines, vtterly reiected, confirmed more deſperately his reſolution to kill her: and often hauing weapon, preſence, place, and opportunity, purpoſely thought to performe it, but euer was daunted, when he beheld the glory of her preſence, and Majeſtie in her face, wherein to his ſeeming, the Image of God, in her his Vicegerent, was portrayed, commanding him obedience, and threatning deſtruction to thoſe who intend violence againſt his holy Anointed.

(99) My Lords, now that the conſpiracy is diſcouered, the fault cõfeſſed, my cõſcience cleared, & mind prepared patiently to ſuffer paines due for ſo hainous a crime: I hope it ſhall not offend you, if crying, Miſerere, with the poore Publican, I leaue to deſpaire with curſed Cain. My caſe is rare, and ſtrange, and for any thing I can remember, ſingular: a naturall Subiect ſolemnly to vow the death of his naturall Queene, (ſo borne, ſo knowne, and ſo taken by all men) for the reliefe of the afflicted Catholike, and reſtitution of Religion. The matter firſt conceiued in Venice, the ſeruice (in generall words) preſented to the Pope, continued and vndertaken in Paris: and laſtly, commended and warranted by his Holineſſe; digeſted and reſolued in England, if it had not beene preuented by accuſation, or by her Majeſties greater lenity, and more gracious vſage of her Catholike Subiects. This is my firſt and laſt offence conceiued againſt my Prince, or Countrey, and doth (I cannot deny) containe all other faults whatſoeuer. It is now to be puniſhed by death, or moſt graciouſly (beyond all common expectation) to be pardoned. Death I doe confeſſe to haue deſerued: life I doe (with all humilitie) craue, if it may ſtand with the Queenes Honour, and policie of the time. To leaue ſo great a Treaſon vnpuniſhed, were ſtrange; to draw it by my death, in example, were dangerous. A ſworne ſeruant to take vpon him ſuch an enterprize, vpon ſuch a ground, and by ſuch a warrant, hath not beene ſeene in England. To indite him, arraigne him, bring him to the Scaffold, and to publiſh his offence, can doe no good. To hope that he hath more to diſcouer then is confeſſed, or that at his execution hee will vnſay any thing hee hath written, is in vaine. To conclude, that it is impoſsible for him in time to make ſome part of amends, were very hard and againſt former experiences. The queſtion then is, whether it be better to kill him, or (leſt the matter be miſtaken) vpon hope of his amendment, to pardon him. For mine owne opinion (though partiall) I will deliuer you my conſcience. The caſe is good Queene Elizabeths; the offence is committed againſt her ſacred Perſon; and ſhee may (of her mercy) pardon it without preiudice to any. Then this I ſay in few words, as a man more deſirous to diſcharge his troubled conſcience, then to liue. Pardon poore Parrie, *and releeue him: for life without liuing is not fit for him. If this may not be, or be thought dangerous or diſhonourable to the Queenes Majeſty (as by your fauours, I thinke it full of honour and mercy) then I beſeech your Lordſhips (and no other) once to heare mee before I bee indicted, and afterwards, if I muſt die, humbly to intreat the Queenes Majeſty to haſten my triall and execution: which I pray God with all my heart, may prooue as honourable to her; as I hope, it ſhall bee happy to mee. (102) Had not then her Majeſty juſt cauſe to complaine, as ſhee did? when in the honourable aſſembly of Parliament, ſhee openly profeſſed, that Shee knew no creature breathing, whoſe life ſtood hourely in more perill then her owne; and that euen at the firſt entrance into her eſtate, ſhee entred into infinite dangers of life, as one that had to wreſtle with many and mighty enemies. And yet, in confidence of her celeſtiall Protector, and of her owne innocency, ſhee often ſeemed ſomewhat too remiſſe and neglectiue in the care of her ſelfe and life, as appeared manifeſtly by her proceedings with this laſt Traitor, in keeping his conference of that importance, from the knowledge of her Councellors, and often admitting priuately his acceſſe, though he had told her, hee was the man appointed to worke her death. And indeed ſuch was this Princeſſe Magnanimity, that in an apparant danger, as great, though not ſo traiterous as this, ſhee ſhewed a reſolution of courage farre aboue her ſexe, when being in her Barge vpon Thames to take the aire, accompanied with the French Ambaſſador, the Earle of Lincolne, and others, a Seruingman in the Court, from his Caliuer diſcharged a Bullet, and ſhot the Waterman, within ſixe foot of her ſeat, (the ſecond to her Bales) thorow both the armes; whereat all other being amazed, and the man abundantly bleeding, ſhee threw him her ſcarfe, and with words of comfort bade him be of good cheere, he ſhould not want, for the Bullet was aimed at Her, though it hit him; and with ſuch reſolute courage bare it out, as all preſent admired. Neither ſo onely, but knowing afterwards that it was done caſually at randome, ſhee both pardoned the partie of his life, when he was to die, and commanded his Maſter to retaine him againe into his ſeruice.

(103) And indeed, of ſo ſingular clemency, and inbred lenity was this Lady, that ſhee neuer heard mention of the capitall (though neuer ſo deſerued) puniſhment of offenders, euen of ſuch as had ſought her owne death, but it bred a kinde of horrour and ſorrow in her; wherby, had not her Councellers earneſtly inculcated the neceſſity of ſuch exemplary Iuſtice, many dangerous attempters had eſcaped their due puniſhment. Which mooued her to ſay, being once queſtioning with a * great Diuine of Oxford, about bookes meeteſt for Princes to ſtudy on, that her Reading of Seneca de Clementia, had done her much good, but ſome would perſwade her, it had done her State as much harme. But for her loue to her people in generall, and tender care ouer the poorer ſort, or any waies oppreſſed, it was incomparable; whoſe eares were not only open at all times to their complaints, and her hands ready to receiue their petitions; but her manner was also to commend their cause vnto her Councell and Iudges, giuing these and the like earnest charges; Haue care of my people, you haue my place: do you to them that which I ought to do; they are my people, yet euery man oppresseth and spoileth them without mercy. Themselues can neither helpe themselues, nor reuenge their quarrell: See vnto them, I pray you, see vnto them, for they are my charge, them therefore I charge you with, euen as God hath committed them vnto me. I care not for my self, my life is not deare vnto me, my care is for my people; I pray God my Successor be as carefull for thē; and surely they which might know my cares for my people, may likewise conceiue, that I take no great ioy in wearing the Crowne.

(104) What heart then could conceiue so great mischiefe, or hand could bee so barbarously violent, as to worke the destruction of so louing a nursing Mother, but onely those obdurate and venemous Vipers, which eate forth the way from the wombe of their owne conceptions; Or rather those sting-tailed Locusts, arising with foggy smoake from the bottomlesse pit, who to reare vp their Dagon, or great King Abaddon, cast down Princes with the wings of their warre, and execute their damnable doctrine in the murthers of the Lords Anointed, whereas Dauid durst not touch Saul, though he was abiected by God?

The Treason laid against him (besides the former of the insurrection in the North, by himselfe confessed, and by the Court fined at fiue thousand Markes) was, that he had bin priuy to the Plots of Throgmorton, for the bringing in of Forraine powers, to the destruction of the Qu. and Realme, which truth being reuealed by other conspirators, he so deepely apprehended, as in that desperate manner he preuented his further judgement.

(107) Neither were these great Ones drawne alone into the confederacie of Romes irreligious purposes, but others also, thirsting for Englands destruction, of lesse quality or place, had parts appointed to be actors in the Scene: which parties themselues shall now enter the Stage, euen foureteene in number; whereof Anthony Babington Esquire, was the Principall, the others were Chidioke Tichborne, Charles Tilney, Edward Abington, Thomas Salisbury, and Edward Iones Esquires, Iohn Sauage, Robert Barnewell, Henry Dun, Iohn Trauerse, Iohn Carnocke, and Richard Gage, Gentlemen, and Iohn Ballard a Seminary Priest; for can there be any conspiracies hatched without them? The plot was the more dangerous, by how much the more secretly carried, and the parties resolute to venture therein vnto death, whereof sixe vndertooke to murther the Queene, and Sauage, bound himselfe for her death.

Babington and his fellowes Treasons.

Babingtons Letter.

(108) The shew must bee against the precise Puritanes, whose chiefe or * head in the Low-Country, not onely threatned (as was pretended) the destruction of all Romish Catholikes, but also to vsurpe the Crown from the Queene; and therefore for the security of both, they were thus enforced to make ready for armes. Their aiders in England were many, as Babington beleeued, who wrote that the West parts, the North parts, all Wales, the Countries of Lancaster, Darby, and Stafford, were in great forwardnesse, and had giuen fidelity to giue aide to the enterprize. That Lord Percy could doe much in the North, Arundel in the South, and the Lord Paget in the heart of the Land, though two of them were then in Prison, and Paget in Spaine; their onely want was of a Nobleman to leade them them, whereof they were deſtitute, as Babington complained, vnleſſe it were Weſtmerland, and he out of the Realme.

Their forreine aſſiſters.

(109) Their forreine aſſiſters were many and ſtrong, eſpecially Spaine, as Mendoza aſſured them. The Ports were appointed where the Inuaders ſhould land, and once landed, ſhould be ſeconded from all parts by the Italianated Engliſh, as they vainly hoped; the Statiſts ſurprized which held not for Rome; the faith reſtored that had beene abandoned, and the vſurping Competitor (for ſo they termed the true Anointed Soueraigne) diſpatched by murther, themſelues the onely men marked (if euer) now to redeeme the Land from the ſeruitude and bondage which Hereſie had brought, with the loſſe of thouſands of ſoules. Theſe were their glozes vpon Pius Quintus his alleaged Text, and the faire viſards that hid their foule faces, whom God himſelfe vnmasked to their following ſhame.

Ballard a Semiary.

(110) For Ballard being ſent to Mendoza, to ſignifie all things now in a readineſſe, and ready to embarke himſelfe for France, was ſuddenly apprehended; and part of the conſpiracy diſcouered. Whereupon Babington, with Charnocke and Sauage, enters a new reſolution, which was immediatly to kill the Queen, whereas of their bounty it had beene ordered before, that ſhee ſhould liue vntill the Inuaſion, which was appointed to be in September following. But being intercepted before he well wiſt, he was committed to Cuſtody, yet ſo, as hee went abroad with his Keeper, from whom he ſhortly made his eſcape: and thinking to recouer the Seas, diſguiſed himſelfe like a Labouring man, ſtaining with Wallnut-tree leaues his hands and face, which ſhadowed neither his ſhame nor ſinne, neither yet could hide him from the eye that called him to account; for being deſcried and brought backe to London, he was with curſes of the people committed to the Tower, whence hee could not ſo eaſily ſtart.

(111) The other conſpirators, hearing of theſe their confederates ſucceſſe, diſperſed themſelues and played leaſt in ſight, yet were they found out, indited and brought to their trials, all of them confeſſing their Treaſons without any torture. Yet at their arraignement (perſwading themſelues belike, that what they did by Papall warrant, could not bee called Treaſon,) they pleaded not guilty, which the Iury vpon manifeſt proofes finding otherwiſe, they worthily receiued iudgement of death, and dyed accordingly in Lincolnes Inne fields, euen in the place where they had often cõferred for the execution of their Treaſons.

The Traitors executed.

(112) The neſt of Conſpirators thus broken in England, and their ſnares ſtill failing though neuer ſo craftily laid, was a ſore corſiue to the Engliſh fugitiues in other forraigne parts, eſpecially to the Ieſuites, whoſe griefes were as great, as is the paine of a Scorpion when he hath ſtung a man. Among whom Iaques Frances a perfidious Traitor, and baſe Laundreſſe ſonne, ſeeing the Catholicks thus caſt downe and their caſe deſperate, if Treaſons were thus preuented and puniſhed, pronounced this maxime out of his vnwaſhed mouth, that the State of England then was, and would be ſo ſettled, as vnleſſe Miſtreſſe Elizabeth (for ſo he termed his dread Soueraigne) were ſuddenly taken away, all the Diuels in Hell would not be able to preuaile againſt, or ſhake it. And Stanley that transfugious Champion for Spaine and Rome, ſo impatient was of theſe vnproſpered proceedings, as hee hired Patrick Cullen, an Iriſh Fencer and Ruffian, to vndertake the death of the Queene, which he did for the ſumme of thirty pounds, but had no more for his money then the report of a Traitors death, which deſeruedly hee ſuffered at Tyburne.

For the assurance of which money, Manuel Andrada, the bringer of the Iewell, conferred with the Conde de Fuentes at Callis; and Stephano Ferrera, a Portugall also, dealt likewise by Letters with Stephano Ibarra the Kings Secretary at Bruxels, to make the same ready: Lopez himselfe assuring them the deed should be done, when the money was paid, which daily was promised and daily expected; the only stay pretended was, that King Philip did not well like, that so base a person as Andrada was, should be employed in so waighty a cause.

(117) And to make experiment of his intendments, Lopez was appointed to giue the Queen Physicke; who made ready the potion, and brought it to her presence. But her Maiesty knowing what hee least suspected, told him, hee must goe minister to the Lord Treasurer Cecill, who at that present had more neede of Physicke then her selfe; whereupon Lopez with double diligence repaired vnto him, signifying, his comming was to minister his Lordship Physicke, so commanded him by the Queene. Yea marry, said the old man, but what is your Physick? A purge, and it please your honor, said Lopez. A purge, Master Doctor, said the Lord Treasurer? I thinke I must become a Physician to purge you, and thereupon hee apprehended him for a Traitor, who stood so perplexed with feare, that his presence was scarce tolerable for the smell. Then other Doctors of Physicke were called, for to examine the ingredients, who easily found that the potion was poyson, for which he was indicted and arraigned at Barre, where hee pleaded not guiltie, and his two Consorts by long circumstances sought to saue their liues, yet their former confessions subscribed with their owne hands, gaue sufficient testimony of their guilts; for which at Tyburne vpon the seuenth of Iune they suffered death.

(119) To forward this enterprize, three seuerall consultations were held at Bruxels, wherein Holt sate as President, and William Stanley Proctor for this diuellish designe, animating Yorke by his Vncles example, to be constantly resolued, as a man ordained for his Countries good, and though many had miscarried in attempting the Act, yet that it was meritorious and easie to bee done. Thomas Throgmorton, Michael Moody, Charles Paget, Henry Owen, Edmund Garret, and the two diuine Doctors, Gifford and Worthington, were principall speakers in this impious Parliament, all of them eager to egge on the two vndertakers, and to ioyne to them a third man, named Young, whose taske should be to kill the greatest Councellors, as soone as the Queene should be dead. The last that spake, was Holt the President, who after he had ministred these Traitors their Oathes, in threatning wise, menaced to take from the the Engliſh this high and acceptable ſeruice, and to employ therein Strangers, who were far more worthy: and ſo ſent the two former into England with his bleſſing, which neuertheleſſe could not ſaue them from the Gallowes: their purpoſes were to get entertainement of ſome great Courtier, the better to effect what they intended, and to ſeeme men of ſome note for intelligence, ſent from Callis to procure their paſport: but the vigilant eie of the Engliſh State had found out their Treaſons before, and bringing them afterwards to their trials, they were found guilty, iudged, and died like Traitors.

(120) The laſt publike attempter, that aſſaied the Queenes death, was Edward Squire, a Scriuener of Greenewich, who by deputation had employment of a purueyer in the Stable, but being in witte aboue his vocation, & carrying his ſailes aboue his fortunes; put himſelfe in action for Sea in the laſt voyage that Sir Francis Drake made into the Indies. Embarked hee was in a ſmall Ship called the Frances, who loſing the Fleete about Guadalupe, was taken by fiue Spaniſh Frigots, and with other brought Priſoners into Spaine: where falling in acquaintance with Richard Walpoole an Engliſh fugitiue, by order a Ieſuite, in great credit, and vicar Generall to Parſons in his abſence, was by him obſerued to bee of more capacity then commonly was found in a man of his quality or education; for yeers, mature, and paſſed his middle age; for carriage well aduiſed, and reſolute enough, if not too much, in not apprehending his eminent danger.

Squier a fit ſubiect to worke vpon.

(121) Vpõ him Walpool therfore meant to work, conceiuing for his purpoſe two ſpeciall aduantages: the one, that cõming into Spaine a Priſoner, and not a fugitiue, his returne into England would be without ſuſpect; the other, that Squire had bin employed in the Queens ſtable, and therfore had liberty of free acceſſe: But the more to inuolue what he intẽded, he ſubtilly cauſed Squier to be apprehended by the Inquiſition, and put priſoner into the holy Houſe: where mollified by diſtreſſe, he got his heart into his hands, ſo that of a Neuter he became a fixed Romaniſt.

(122) This firſt aſſay prouing effectuall, for an introduction to his further intendments, he fell into the old ſong; whoſe burden was the tyrannies vſed, & the perſecutiõs exerciſed in England againſt the poor Catholikes; vpon how few perſons the Engliſh State did ſtand, & how eaſily thoſe props were to be remooued, if any deuoted would put to their hands. Squier who wanted no wit to perceiue whereat he aymed; firſt, gaue ſome ſlight ſignification, and after a more ſerious proteſtation, that he was the man that would ſacrifice himſelfe and his ſeruice in the cauſe.

Walpoole proiects the killing of the Earle of Eſſex.

(123) The good Father hauing thus got him into the circle, began then the charme: It were (ſaid he) no doubt, a worke meritorious to kill the Earle of Eſſex; but vnum neceſſarium, one thing is neceſſary: And then told him plainely, that he meant to put a ſeruice vpon him of great worth, and reward; which he might accompliſh without any euident perill of life, becauſe it was to be done not immediatly vpon her perſon, nor in her preſence, neither yet in doing it (though hee were ſeene) ſhould be endangered, being acted as he would preſcribe; and that was to impoyſon the pommell of the Queenes ſaddle, at ſuch time as ſhee ſhould ride abroad, the Pommell being the place, whereon ſhee would reſt her hand, and her hand not vnlikely to touch her mouth or noſtrils, would giue acceſſe to the forcible poyſon. This, ſaid he, might eaſily be performed, he hauing familiar acquaintance in the Quirry, yea, and that very ſafely; but if otherwiſe, and immediate death happened, hee ſhould bee aſſured, that for the exchange of this preſent and tranſitory life, to inioy the ſtate of a glorious Saint in heauen.

He teacheth how to poyſon the Queenes Saddle.

Walpooles helliſh conſultations.

(124) Which Syrens ſong ended, and Squier inveigled; confeſſions, vowes, promiſes, receit of the Sacrament, and all confirmed the reſolution of the diuelliſh attempt; and to preuent varying from this Center, Walpoole told him, That now he ſtood in the ſtate of damnation, if hee did not his vttermoſt endeauour to performe his vow, bidding him remember, how that the ſinne of backe-ſlyding did ſeldome obtaine pardon; and if he did but once make doubt of the lawfulneſſe or merit of the act, it was enough to caſt him headlong downe into hell; and if hee did conceiue any difficulties, he wiſhed him to conſider what it auailed a man, to winne the whole world, and to loſe his owne ſoule.

His ghoſtly Counſels.

(125) Squier thus armed (though not with the complete Armour of the Apoſtle) fell downe in confeſſion before this Ieſuites feet; whom hee lifted vp, hugd him about the necke with his left arme (ſuch were Squiers owne words) and croſſing him with his other hand, mumbled a few words in His Fatherly benediction.

Latine, and then distinctly in English spake thus; God blesse thee, and giue thee strength my sonne; bee of good courage, I pawne my soule for thine, and thou shalt haue my prayers dead and aliue. Thereupon deliuering vnto him the poison, directed how it should bee vsed; and shewed him the nature of the confection; which was, to bee put into a double bladder, and when it was to bee employed, to bee pricked full of holes, and so pressed out vpon the Pommell of the Queenes saddle; the operation whereof was such, that vpon his hand he must haue a thicke double gloue, lest the poyson thereof should infect himselfe; whose vigour also was such, as neither continuance of time, nor subtilty of ayre could checke or vn-vertuate the strength: And that the matter might be carried without all suspect, an exchange was accepted of two Spanish prisoners in England, for Rowles and Squier to bee released from Spaine.

The vse & force of the poyson.

(126) Thus himselfe poysoned in heart, and minding to poyson others, being monied by the Iesuite, arriued in England, not long before the expedition for Cadiz; which action (as hee thought) fitted him well, and thereupon made suit and obtained it, to attend the Earle of Essex in his owne Ship; aswell to be absent when the poyson should worke on her Maiesty (which he meant to bestow before his departure) as to haue opportunity therby, to poyson the Earle himselfe. Occasion being giuen by the Qu^s. riding abroad, and Her Horse made ready, and attending in the Stable-yard, thither Squier repaired full of euill spirits; and laying his hand vpon the Pommell of her Saddle, bruised out the poyson in the bladder, saying cheerfully, God saue the Queene; with no better affection then Ioab bare to Amasa, when with his hand he tooke him to kisse him, but with his sword strucke him to the heart. His part thus plaid, Gods wonted and wonderfull protection beganne, who vnder his Canopy or wings of mercy had euer shadowed her from the stroke of danger, for albeit the * season was hot, and the veines open to receiue any maligne tainture, yet Her body felt no distemperature, nor Her hand felt no more hurt, then Pauls did, when hee shooke off the Viper into the fire.

Acts 25. 1.

(127) The deed thus done, without all mistrust, Squier taking the remaine of the poyson, within sixe dayes after departed to the Sea, and had his entertainment in the Earle of Essex his owne Ship, where seeking to finish his diuellish designe betwixt Faial and Saint Michaels, bestowed his confection vpon the Pommels of a woodden chaire, wherein the Earle vsually sate at meales: which in like manner (the Lord so working) tooke not effect, to the no little admiration of Squier, though very well satisfied, that the default was not his, but rather in the poyson it selfe; and his vow now discharged (as hee thought) hee slept the more quiet.

Squiers endeuour to poyson the Earle of Essex going to Cadiz.

Squiers Treasõs succesfeleese.

(128) Walpoole the Iesuite ouer-tickled with ioy of his hoped successe, and not able longer to keepe secrecy, imparted his Treasons to his companions in Spaine, who together with him daily expected the issue thereof: but all things silent, and no newes of the Catastrophe, they changed their opinions, and held Squier for a false-brother, when as also their longing hearts beganne to feare, lest the maine cause would bee mard, being cast into so bad a mould. Whereupon a consultation was called, and the Sicophant condemned in the highest degree, whose end must bee speedily wrought, or else those Catholike proceedings would surely come to wracke; for that hee knowing much, would (as was feared) reueale much more; and therefore it was politikely concluded, that one should bee let slip from them into England, to giue information of Squiers Treasons.

Squier mistrusted to bee a false brother.

(129) This man to haue the more credit, brought two letters in his budget, the one he affirmed, himselfe had stolne out of a Iesuites study, and the other brought from another person, both which indeed were found to bee counterfeit, and Squier for the present reputed an honest man. Yet because the matter was tender and touched neere the quicke, Squier was sent for, and examined; at first hee denies all, but comming to circumstances; something was found, hold taken, and the Traitor committed to Prison; who left alone, beganne to bethinke him how farre his Confessors Confession might extend, & therefore by good counsell (the truth withall working) he disclosed the Treason, and how farre he had therein gone, which indeed no man had knowledge of but himselfe, and this confessed at the Tower, without torture, and at the Barre with remorse of conscience, hee had his sentence sentence of death, which he accordingly suffered.

The iust motiue to the State to make sharpe lawes to preuent Treasons.

(130) Had not then the wise Statists of the Land, cause to enact such Lawes as they did; to set the shaking Sword in the entrance of this faire Eden, and to stop out the wilde Boare that would lay the Vineyard waste: their Queene and lampe of Glory, hauing thus often and narrowly escaped extinguishing, by as many hands of murthering Priests and Iesuites, as Dauid had pursuers of his life, when to Ionathan hee complained, that there was but a step betwixt him and death? So that iustly in a conference of Parliament, for meanes to be had against the many conspirators, daily leuelling at her Royall heart, One of good repute, hauing experience of their desperate designes, in the open Assembly, with a feeling affection, thus vttered his minde: that euery night when hee awaked, hee feared to heare some newes of desperate mischiefe, and protested before God, he neuer saw the light of the day, but that he feared before the Sunset, to heare of some strange attempt.

1 Sam. 20. 3.

So many and so continually were the conspiracies.

(131) For as the Pope had denounced vnder his Buls, an absolution to him that would dethroane Elizabeth, Englands faire Queene: so were there many foule-minded Proselites, that reputed her blood as an acceptable sacrifice, which many times they sought to offer vnto their god: but Hers and our God, The Watchman of Israel, neither slumbred nor slept in protecting her Person, as the apple of his eye; whose iust defence, her innocency, and their bloody guilts, haue often diuulged to the whole world; neuer any Prince escaping so many dangers, as this most milde and maiden Queene in her daies had done, and many more (no doubt) were put in practice, which lay groueling in darkenesse, and neuer came to light; and, as the workes of darkenesse, so let them lye, and let vs hasten to our former, and farre more pleasing Subiect. Hauing therefore from the yeere 1570. made our digression, for the closer relation of all those treacheries together; let vs thence pursue the ensuing occurrents of her Raigne and Life.

Many more conspiracies then euer came to light.

(132) In Anno 1571. and thirteenth of her most happy Raigne, that the State might be stayed vpon an approoued succession, a Parliament was called, and therein thus was enacted: For the auoiding of contentions, and seditious spreading abroad titles to the succession of the Crowne of this Realme, to the disturbing of the quiet of the Realme: Be it enacted by the authoritie aforesaid, that whosoeuer shall hereafter, during the life of our said Soueraigne Lady, by any Booke, or worke printed or written, directly and expresly declare, and affirme at any time before the same be by Act of Parliament of this Realme established and affirmed, that any one particular person, whosoeuer it be, is, or ought to be the right Heire and successor to the Queenes Maiestie that now is, (whom God long preserue) except the same be the naturall issue of her body: or shall wilfully set vp in open place, publish, or spread any Bookes or Scrowles to that effect; or shall print, binde, or put to sale, or vtter any such Booke or writing wittingly: that he, or they, their Abettors and Counsellors, and euery of them, shall for the first offence suffer imprisonment of one whole yeere, and forfeit halfe his goods, wherof the one moity to the Queens Maiestie, the other moity to him or them that will sue for the same, by bill, action of debt, plaint, information, or otherwise, in any of the Queenes Maiesties Courts, wherein no essoyne or protection shall be allowed: And if any shall eft-soones offend therein, then they, and euery of them, their Abettors, and Counsellors shall incurre the paines and forfeitures which in the Statutes of prouision, or premunire are appointed and limitted.

Parl. in An. 13. Elizab. Reg. April 2.

(133) Notwithstanding these sharpe threats, and seeming set edge against such offenders, and disturbers of State, yet was the prosecution thereof executed with a more soft temper: for not any one person (resting there onely without further attempts) felt the weight of that imposed fine: so milde was the disposition of this Maiden Queene, and so inclined to mercy, though necessity required more strict Iustice in those rebellious and Papall times.

(134) But that Pen of Sanders which enuiously hath written, and those Romanists that suspiciously haue glozed vpon the words of that Parliament, The Naturall Issue of her Body, as intended for an vnlawfull Bed, let be accursed, and them accounted for shameless Recorders of State-passages, who opprobriously seeke and search into the thoughts of farre better Subiects; and by their selfe-wicked imaginations, doe blot the faire proceedings of that Honourable Assembly, and as much as in them is, defame the vertues of that Virgin Queene: whose chaste remembrance among her many other Princely parts, is celebrated thorow the whole World, and euer shall be.

(135) But shee being the Maule that beat beat downe their Dagon, and the Lyon that met their crooked Serpent in his way, thoſe Wizards teeth were ſet on edge with vntruths, and their tongues as ſharpe Razors whetted vnto ſlander: for which let themſelues expect, and we attend what reward ſhall bee giuen vnto ſuch falſe tongues.

(136) Nor was Scotland free from their treacherous attempts, when at the ſame time their Regent was ſlaine by the ſhot of an Harquebuſſe, as hee rode thorow Lithquo, miſtruſting no danger. And a roade made into England in time of Peace, by ſome diſcontented Scottiſh, who carryed great booties with them into Scotland: to recouer which, Suſſex the Earle Generall, and Lord Hunſdon, Gouernour of Barwicke followed, and in Tiuidale did much hurt to the Inhabitants.

And the Earle of Lennox ſent into Scotland by her Maieſty, was firſt made Lord Gouernour, and after Lord Regent, by the election of their three Eſtates, who afterwards was as trayterouſly murthered, as the other before him had beene, which cauſed great troubles in Scotland; yea, and ſome Nobles of England were not exempted from the ſame.

For being a man filled with fauour, both of his Prince, and of the People, Fortune at length made him a Ball for her banding; who firſt from Burnam beſides Windſore was brought to Weſtminſter, and thence by water was left Priſoner in the Tower, where he remained from the eleuenth of October, vnto the fourth of Auguſt following, and then was remooued to the Charter-Houſe neere Smithfield, where he abode thirteene moneths ſpace; till laſtly he was ſent backe againe into the Tower, where, vpon the Hill and ordinary Scaffold, he penitently ſuffered death.

(139) In this yeere of Chriſts natiuity, 1572. the eighteenth of Nouember, appeared a ſtrange Starre or Comet Northward, in the Conſtellation of Caſſiopeia, euen at the backe of her Chayre; which with three chiefe fixed Starres of the ſaid Conſtellation, made a Geometricall figure loſenge-wiſe. This Starre in bigneſſe at the firſt appearing, ſeemed bigger then Iupiter, and not much leſſe then Venus, when ſhee ſeemeth greateſt. It neuer changed place, but was carried about with the daily motion of the Heauens, as all fixed Starres commonly are; and was obſerued by the greateſt Mathematicians, to haue beene in place celeſtiall farre aboue the Moone, otherwiſe then euer any Comet hath beene ſeene, or naturally can appeare, nor the like from the beginning of the World did euer appeare, vnleſſe it were That which at Chriſts Natiuitie was ſeene, vnto which Starre indeed Philip of Mornay, Lord of Pleſsie, doth compare it. *Tru. (140) About which time, a ſtrange caſe (which we will inſert, rather to ſhew the courſe of Iuſtice and mercy of the Queene, then for any other great vſe in Story) happened at the Common-Law Barre; where Simon Lowe, and Iohn Kyme were Plaintifes, for a certaine Mannor and Demaines in the Ile of Harty, adjoyning to that of Sheppey in Kent, wrongfully poſſeſt (as they alleaged) by Thomas Paramour, againſt whom they brought a Writ of right: the Defendant offered to maintaine his Title by Combate, which the Plaintifes accepted, and brought their Champions before the Iudges to the Barre. For Paramour, was George Thorne, of a bigge and broad ſet, who caſt downe his Gauntlet as Challenger, to iuſtifie Paramours right, which was taken vp by Henry Naylor Maſter of Defence, a man proper and ſlender, and not very tall, who appeared for Lowe and Kyme, to make good their claime.

Duell or Combat for title of Lands.

The two Champions.

(141) The place appointed for Combate, was in Tuttle-fields, where a Plot of ground of one and twentie yards ſquare, was doubly rayled, and without the Weſt-ſquare a Stage ſet for the Iudges, repreſenting the Court of Common Pleas, behind the which, two Tents were pitched, the one for Thorne, and the other for Naylor, the field with Scaffolds on euery ſide for People to ſee. hands, and gaue command and directions for the Parties agreement, with a ſurceaſe from all further ſuite, which could not well be, vnleſſe the Champions appeared in field; who altogether ignorant of what was determined, vpon the day aſſigned appeared in place, Thorne was there firſt, who was brought to his Tent by Sir Ierome Bowes; then came Naylor, hauing the Gauntlet borne before him vpon a Swords point, a Truncheon (Taper-wiſe) typt with Horne, about an Ell long, and a ſhield of hard leather carryed after him; and ſo was conueyed to his Tent by Sir Henry Cheiney.

(142) The Court ſet, and the Combatters called, Naylor entred the lyſts, being led by the hand by Sir Ierome Bowes, where making his obeyſance, hee came to the Barre, and there held vp his Shield. Then was Thorne brought into the lyſts by Sir Henry Cheyney, and with like reuerence he held vp his Shield. Whereupon an Oath was miniſtred to the approuer, the Tenour whereof hee ſpake as followeth: Heare this, you Iudges, that I haue this day neither eate, drunke, nor haue vpon me, either bone, ſtone, ne graſſe, or any enchantment, ſorcery, or witch-craft, where-through the power of the Word of God might be inleaſed or diminiſhed, and the Diuels power increaſed: and that my appeale is true, ſo helpe me God, and his Saints, and by this Booke.

The Oath miniſtred to the Challenger.

(143) Then was Proclamation made in her Maieſties Name, that no Perſon of whatſoeuer eſtate, degree, or condition there preſent, bee ſo hardy to giue any token or ſigne, by countenance, ſpeech, or language, either to the Prouer, or to the Defender, whereby the one of them may take aduantage of the other, and no perſon to remooue, but keepe ſtill his place: and euery perſon to keepe their ſtaues and their weapons to themſelues; and ſuffer neither the ſaid Prouer, nor Defender to take any of their weapons, or any other thing that may ſtand either to the ſaid Prouer or Defender any auaile, vpon paine of forfeiture of Lands, Tenements, Goods, Chattels, and impriſonment of their bodies, and making fine and ranſome at the Queenes pleaſure. But when all theſe Ceremonies were ended, the Lord Chiefe Iuſtice ſtood vp, and forbade the proceedings, alotting Paramour the Lands, with the ſatisfying of the Plaintifes; and thereupon commanded Naylor to giue Thorne againe his Gauntlet, which hee vnwillingly did; and ſo the Combat being ended, we may haue leaue to proceed.

The Combat ended before it begun.

(144) Peace flouriſhing in England, to no great liking of the Seminary, that often ſought to diſturbe it: the Regent of Scotland craued aide of her Maieſtie, for the defence of the young King, and the Countrey, endangered at that time with ciuill broyles. Shee as tender in her affection, as he dutifull in his alleageance, ſent him fifteene hundred men, whereof Sir William Drury, Knight Marſhall of Berwicke, was Generall. Theſe comming to Edenborough, laid battery to the Caſtle, with no leſſe then thirty Cannons; and were as valiantly reſiſted by the Scottiſh within, but for want of freſh water, and no ayde to be expected, the Souldiers ſicke, hurt, ouer-wearyed, and diuided in opinion, Lord Peteroe being let downe from the wall, by compoſition the Caſtle was ſurrendered, to the vſe of the young King, whereupon the Engliſh returned to Berwicke.

(145) This time of Elizabeths, like vnto that of Auguſtus, when the Temple of Ianus ſtood (for the moſt part) continually ſhut, made London like Rome, to be moſt magnificently repaired, and with many ſtately edifices adorned; among which, for beauty and commodious vſe, none is more famous then the Royall Exchange, (ſo named by her Highneſſe) whoſe Founder was Sir Thomas Greſham Knight, Agent to her Maieſtie, built for the confluence and commerce of Merchants, whoſe Traffikes were great, and in theſe times of peace, extended their Nauigations into the fartheſt, (and till then, vnſearched) parts of the World.

Sir Francis Drakes voyage. An. Dom. 1577. Rich. Hakluyt in Engliſh voyages.

(148) Among theſe Sea-Worthies our famous Vlyſſes, Sir Francis Drake is the firſt in the ranke, who the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus, 1577. and fifteenth of Nouember, ſet faile from Plimmouth in a Fleet of fiue Ships, and one hundred ſixtie foure men, who hauing put off Cap de Verd, in the beginning of February, hee ſaw no land, till the fifth of April following, being paſt the line, thirty three degrees of latitude, and in the 36. degree entred the Riuer Plate, whence hee fell with the ſtraite of Magellan the one and twenty of Auguſt, which with three of his Ships hee paſſed, hauing caſt-off the other two as impediments vnto him, and the Marygold toſſed from her Generall after paſſage, was no more ſeene; but the other, whereof Maſter Iohn Winter was Captaine, ſhaken alſo off by tempeſt, returned thorow the Straites, and recouered England; only the Pellican, whereof himſelf was Admirall, held on her courſe to Chily, Coquimbo, Cinnano, Palma, Lima, vpon the Weſt of America, where he paſſed the line the firſt day of March, and ſo forth, till hee came to the Latitude 47. thinking by thoſe North-Seas to haue found paſſage to England. But fogs, froſts and cold windes forced him to turne his Courſe South-Weſt from thence, and came to Anchor 38. degrees from the Line, where the King of that Countrey preſented vnto him his networke Crown of many coloured feathers, and reſigned therewith his Scepter of gouernment vnto his deuotion, his people ſo admiring our men, that they ſacrificed vnto them, as to their gods. This place for the glory of England, he named Noua Albion according to her ancient name, and at his departure areared a Monument to witneſſe what there had beene done, which was a plate of Braſſe fixed in an eminent place, wherein was engrauen her Maieſties name, and her right to that Prouince, as freely giuen vnto her deputy both by King and people. Wherein alſo was written the yeere and day of their entrance, and of the Lands deliuerance, vnder which Plate hee put her Maieſties picture and armes in a piece of Siluer, to retaine the memory of this ſeruice vnto poſteritie. From thence the fourteenth of Nouember he fell with Ternate one of the Iles of Moluco, being curteouſly entertained of the King, and from thence he came vnto the Iles of Celebees, to Iaua Major, to the Cape Buona Speranze, and fell with the Coaſts of Guinea; whence croſſing againe the Line, hee came to the height of the Azores, and thence into England vpon the third of Nouember and yeere of Saluation 1580. after he had beene at Sea with ſuch fortunate ſucceſſe the ſpace of three yeeres lacking twelue daies. The ſmall veſſell wherein this admirable voyage was performed, was, at her Maieſties commandement, laid vp in the Docke beſides Deepeford, where it remaineth as a monument of Englands great fame, vnto this day, and the worthy Generall honoured with Knighthood, being the firſt that by trauell incompaſſed the Earth, and ſaw the wonderous workes of God in thoſe great Deepes.

We wiſhing from GOD the mighty Creator, a moſt fortunate increaſe of all the affaires of your Excellency, and happy ſucceſſe; and offering eternall vowes and prayſes worthy of our mutuall and perpetuall familiarity and league,* league, and declaring the premiſſes, and that which followeth with ſingular decentneſſe: We giue you to vnderſtand moſt friendly, that certaine yeeres paſſed, we had continuall wars with Caſulbas, Prince of Perſia, in right of our People, by reaſon whereof wee would not make warre vpon other parts, whereby certaine theeues in the parts of Polonia, called Caſakes, and other wicked perſons lurking in thoſe confines, daily troubled and grieued our Subiects: now the Perſian being vanquiſhed, and by the power of the Almighty Creator, matters in thoſe parts being compounded, wee determined to puniſh the ſaid perſons lurking in Poland, and other parts; and by the Belgerby of Greece our Army being ioyned, and ſent with our charge by a Prince of Tartaria, in the yeere laſt paſſed, a part of the Kingdome of Polonia, was on our behalfe troubled, and waſted, and the ſaid Caſakes, and other wicked perſons were puniſhed accordingly to their deſerts, which the King of Poland ſeeing, and ſending two meſſengers to our bleſſed Port, to inquire, finde out, and puniſh in full puniſhment, ſignified ſo much vnto vs, and required our acceptation of his preſent; but we would not allow his Petition, but had fully determined againe to ſend our Army againſt the ſaid King of Poland; but the Ambaſſadour of your Maieſty remaining in our bleſſed Port, interpoſing himſelfe, and ſignifying that hee did aſſiſt your Excellency with Corne, Gunpowder, Maſts, and other things neceſſary for warre, out of the confines of Polonia; now when as the Kingdome of Polonia by our meanes was troubled, and your Ambaſſador declared vnto vs your ſingular and peculiar pleaſure, the ſame his declaration and interceſſion was vnto vs gratefull and acceptable, and your Excellency to whom wee owe all fauours and honour. We wrote our Letters to the King of Polonia on this manner; That the ſaid factious wicked perſons & Caſakes, ſhould be found out and fully puniſhed, but if on the behalfe of your Maieſty, a louing league of Peace had not beene ſollicited for the King of Poland, we would not by any meanes haue entred League with him, but onely at your requeſt we haue ſhewed this grace to the ſaid King and his Subiects, and ſith our familiaritie is mutuall and perpetuall, we thinke it conuenient that your Maieſty ioyning your ſelfe with the Kingdome of Polonia, doe not leaue to continue warre with the King of Spaine, who ſo long time hath kept warre againſt you; and if your Maieſty be not grieued to write vnto vs by ſome truſty man, we vow, by the aide of the Omnipotent Creator, that all neceſſary things ſhall be on our part finiſhed and ordered, that a ſpeedy diſpatch may bee made into Spaine, *wherein for our parts no aſſiſtance ſhall be wanting, whereof you may nothing doubt. (151) Gregory, of that name the thirteenth, and ſtout ſtirring man of Rome: ſeeing Pope Pius his thunder-bolts fall ſhort of the marke whereunto they were aimed, thought it neceſſary to raiſe that begun foundation, (though with ill burnt bricke, and bad tempred mortar) as that his mounted Cannons from the height, might reach and command where the other had left: To which purpoſe hee ſollicited Philip King of Spaine, after his fortunes had ſet him in Portugall, Anno 1582. to vndertake warre againſt Queene Elizabeth either directly or vnderhand, in fauour of the Iriſh Rebels, vnto which charge he offered not only his holy bleſſing, and ſpirituall treaſure, but alſo to acquit him of the fruits of the Archbiſhopricke of Toledo, long retained in his hands, whileſt the Archbiſhop remained ſuſpended, and the King receiued ſome millions of Crownes, which the Pope claimed to belong vnto the See of Rome. But Philip not yet ready to attempt vpon England, ioyned with him for the conqueſt of Ireland; the one ſending ſixe hundred men vnder the command of Thomas Stukely, whom he had lately ſtiled Marqueſſe of Ireland, (a profuſe and defamed perſon throughout all Chriſtendome, flying out of England for his many Piracies, and now imploied to follow the conſecrated Standard of the Church;) the other, bearing all the charge, with an addition of three hundred Spaniards, ſending money with them to wage foure thouſand men more; and the more to kindle the flames of Rebellions, Doctor Sanders (the Arch-Rebell and Engliſh Fugitiue) was ſent from the Popes holy-ſide.

know wherefore they were come: and Desmond, a man desperate to euill, put in action by Papall authoritie, had laid his hopes no lower (by these aydes now arriued) then presently to become the sole King of Ireland, as Benhadad boasted ouer Israel, before his harnesse was put on.

1 King 20.11.

(153) To salute this puppet King, and to welcome these Papals with such entertainment as his martiall sword would allow, Arthur Lord Grey, Baron of Wilton, then Deputy of Ireland, hasted to Dingle, and so to Del-Ore, where hee bade them to so sharpe a banquet, that all the Spaniards, Italians, and Biscayes, notwithstanding their bragging brauadoes, yeelded their weapons at the first brunt, and vpon the points of the aduersaries, dyed without mercy; the Captaines, Coronel, Secretary, and few more reserued for ransome. The Fort they had stored with money, Bisket, Bacon, Oyle and Wine, sufficient to hold out the space of sixe moneths, and furnished with Powder, Shot, and Armour sufficiently for two thousand men: with them all the Irish, as well women as men dyed; and Desmond driuen into extreme want, fearing the pricke of euery thorne, and the shadow of euery bush, notwithstanding he was armed with an Agnus Dei, and an inchanted Ring sent from the Popes owne finger hung about his necke, yet could he not keepe his traiterous head vpon his shoulders; when like a Wolfe wandering in the woods for his prey, was in a poore Cottage wounded by a Souldier rushing in vpon him, and being knowne, was presently cut shorter by the head. But with his end, ended not the troubles of Ireland, especially those parts of Vlster, that lay most remote from England.

An. Dom. 1573. Walter Earle of Essex, in Ireland.

(154) And whereunto, Walter Earle of Essex, accompanied with the Lord Rich, and others, had formerly made an expedition, aswell to reduce those wild Irish, vnto a more ciuill life & respectiue obedience vnto the English Crowne, as to winne them to the knowledge of Christ, whom they most ignorantly worshipped. But the death of this Nobleman hapning before his intendments could be accomplished, left that to be followed by others which himselfe had begun.

(155) The troubles of which Prouince we haue partly touched vnto the death of Shan O-Neale, whose Seignories by Parliament were inuested into the Queenes hands, and a Law enacted, that from thenceforth no man should assume the name or title of O-Neale. After which, some small blasts of peace breathed vpon those parts; till shortly Turlogh Leinigh, a brothers sonne of Con-More, the Grandfather of this Shan, by a popular election tooke that style vpon him, a man stept farre in yeeres, which made him more quiet, and much the rather, for feare of Shan O-Neales sonnes, but especially of Hugh Baron of Dungannon the sonne of bastard Mathew, vnto whom he had giuen his daughter in Marriage, and the said Baron had lately repudiated and cast off.

The name or title of O-Neale forbidden.

(156) This Turlogh was most obsequious and seruiceable to Queene Elizabeth, stirring no troubles to the English, though to his neighbours the Irish hee prooued most sterne: For, O-Donell hee disquieted, the Scots of the Ilands he molested, and in an incounter slew Alexander Oge the slayer of Shan O-Neale; and indeed became so fearefull, that his sonne in law Hugh, lay hid from him in his owne Countrey; and lastly, escaped his hands into England, where to raise himselfe from his obscure estate and condition, hee got command of a troupe of Horse, with a pension of a thousand Markes by yeere from the Queene. Whose seruice against the Rebellious Desmond, was so well performed and accepted, that hee obtained the place and title of Earle of Tir-Oen, pleading the Letters Patent of King Henry the eighth, granted to his Grand-father, and his heires Males, whereof himselfe was the sonne of Mathew, created Baron of Dungannon by the same King. Thus growne vnto greatnesse, old Turlogh vpon certaine conditions resigned vnto him the Gouernment of Vlster, where shortly combining himselfe with the men of most might, they together associated their strengths to defend the Romish religion, for that was the mantle that euer couered their hatched rebellions.

Turlogh, a tyrant against his neighbours.

Baron Dungannon got imployments of the Queene.

Hee is made Earle of Tir-Oen.

(157) The first Champion that sounded the Alarum, was Mac-Guyre, a man of a turbulent spirit, thrust forward by Guaran a Priest, whom Pope Vrbane the second had ordained Primate of Ireland, commanding him in the name of God to fight there the Lords Battaile, assuring him by his Apostolicall warrant, of most fortunate proceedings and happy successe. But see how this great Prophet was deceiued; for by the valour of Sir Richard Mat. Guyre.

Guaran bought his primacy at a deare rate.

Richard Bingham, Mac-Guyre was discomfited, and the primate Priest slaine in the field.

Tir-Oens good seruice against Mac-Guyre.

(158) The Confederacy thus broken, Mac-Guyre set himselfe for open rebellion; whom Tir-Oen in shew of his dutifull obedience pursued, and was so forward in seruice, that hee receiued a wound in his thigh, to his no little honour. Whereupon he became of greater respect in the English Court, and more inhaunsed in his owne esteeme; so that he feared not to exhibite Complaints against the Lord Deputy, Sir William Fitz-Williams, the Marshall, whose sister hee had married, and the Garrisons souldiers that guarded those parts. But the Deputy recalled, and Sir William Russell appointed in his place; as if all quarrels had beene quite forgotten, he came vnto the new Lord Deputy, & exhibited an humble submission vpon his knees, wherein he dolefully expressed his inward griefe, in that her Maiesty had conceiued some indignation against him. His absenting himselfe from the State, hee confessed was disagreeable to his obedience, albeit to bee somewhat excused by the hard measure (as he alleaged) of the late Deputy, and Marshall, that were combined for his destruction. Hee acknowledged that the Queenes Maiesty had aduanced him in title, dignitie and great liuings, and himselfe vnworthy of any, but rather dishonour and ruine, if he should become vngratefull vnto so good a Prince. With these and the like complement of his true heart and meaning, hee possest the Councell of Ireland, that albeit Sir Henry Bagnall, the Marshall was present, and charged him with many subornations of Mac-Guyre, the Primate, the besiege of Inis-Kellin and others, he was by them dismissed and sent home, to the great discontent of the Queene, and disquietnesse of the Land, as afterward followed, and in course of time and story shall be declared.

Tir-Oen growne very bold.

Sir Wm. Russell Lord Deputy.

Tir-Oens dissimulations.

Edward Grimston. in hist. Nether. lib. 10.

(159) Long before these last Irish troubles, (as you may obserue in the relation of some former attempts against the Queene) the brands of dissension were blowne vnto flames, betwixt Queene Elizabeth of England, and Philip the second of that Name, King of Spaine; whose first breaking forth was in the Netherlanders cause, the one persecuting, and the other defending the Religion that those people profest; and thus it began. In the yeere of Grace 1575. Don Lewis, Gouernour of those Low-Countries for the said King, sent his Agent vnto Queene Elizabeth, desiring her to banish such of them as repayred to England, onely their flight, and their religion, all the cause alleaged against them.

The Spanish hostilitie with England.

Don Lewis sent to haue the Netherlanders banished out of England.

(160) Her answer was short, and nothing acceptable, that shee held it vnworthy the Maiesty of a Prince, to chase away those poore exiled and scattered Netherlanders, that were fled into her Dominions, for the safetie of their liues, and to auoid the Spanish tyranny, exercised onely in case of their consciences. And yet she forbade some men of speciall note, as also such as bare Armes, to enter England, vpon condition that Westmerland should bee banished the Low-Countries, with such other Rebels as had fled to the Spaniard. But the Clergy intending to bring their Spanish Inquisition into those parts, the Prince of Orange entred conference with the States of Holland and Zeland, touching the defence of their professed religion, and the preseruation of their distressed Countries, vnable of themselues (as was alleaged) long to defend themselues, and therefore it was thought fittest to choose them a Protector.

Conference among the States, how to withstand the Spanish Inquisition.

(161) This passing for currant among the Councellors of estate, three were in name, The Emperour, the French King, and the Queene of England; for they were past all hope of any assurance with Spain. Yea of these in choise, some excepted against, as neither safe nor conuenient to be yeelded vnto. Against the Empire was alleaged the diuersities of religion, the small vnion of those Germane Princes, and hauing their hands full to keepe their owne at home, would bee the lesse able to assist with helpe abroad. The French (they feared) had wasted their money the onely meanes for warre) with their owne ciuill dissensions; if not, yet might they hardly be trusted, as witnessed the cruell massacre lately committed. England then was the Pillar to which they must leane; their Queene the greatest of all Christian Princes, their Nauy the Commandresse of the Seas, and their people professing the same Religion with them, the surest band of Christian societie: further it was alleaged, that the Realmes of Denmarke and Sweden desired it, the County of Emden and the Hanse Townes in the East intreated for it, Brabant and Flanders sought it; yea and the rightfull Title of the Princesse Elizabeth,

The Emperor, the French King, the Queene of England, in Election for Defence.

Obiections against the French King.

Queene Elizabeth chosen to be the Defender.

The reasons alleaged to haue Elizabeth their Gouernour.

beth, issued from the Earles of Holland, and Zeeland by the Lady Philip, daughter to William the third of that name, Earle of Henault and Holland, did warrant it.

The States of the Low-Countries sent to the English Queene.

(162) Thus then concluded, the States were sent vnto England, and made the end of their comming knowne to the Queene; who wisely weighing into what a Labyrinth shee should enter, sought rather the safetie of her owne, then to consent to their motion; for Spaine, shee well knew, would storme at the Vnion, and France bee in great iealousie to haue such a neighbour; shee therefore promising to bee a mediator vnto the King of Spaine for their peace; and after some complements of Princely entertainments, with thankes for their offer, and sufferance to carry with them many voluntary English souldiers, let them depart: whose deniall made knowne, was nothing well-come to those distressed Prouinces.

Don Iohn made Gouernour of the Low-Countries.

(163) Long after this, Lewis the Gouernour liued not, whom Don Iohn of Austria (base brother to King Philip) succeeded; who at first made shew of most fauourable affection, yet so, as vrging their subiection to Spaine; and obedience to the Apostolicall See of Rome. Neither would hee come to their Councell, without Hostages deliuered, and most of their troupes to guard his suspecting person, esteeming them Lutherans and Heretikes, in whom was no trust.

The States sue againe to the Queene.

(164) These mooued the States once more to sue to her Maiesty, that by her meanes, with peace they might inioy the ancient Priuiledges of their Prouinces, and the freedome of their owne consciences against the Inquisition and Tyranny of Spaine; and indeed so lamentably deplored their case, that the pitty-full Queene sent into Spaine, to desire the King in commiseration to withdraw these extremities from the distressed. But Philip deafe on that eare, and Iohn planting his Garrisons with suspicious intents, Elizabeth began to looke to the maine, sending the King word, Shee liked not that his Souldiers should bee her bad neighbours; and the Gouernour notice, that shee would not suffer the Christian Netherlanders to be tyrannized by his Spaniards. And thereupon caused the value of fortie thousand Angels in Bullion, vnminted (in part of an hundred thousand pound sterling promised) to be sent vnto Brussels, receiuing the States obligations for the same: where also were confirmed certaine conditions betwixt her and them.

(165) This mooued Don Iohn to such conceits, that he intended to doe wonders in England, by interposing himselfe in the Scottish affaires, yea, and by the destruction of Queene Elizabeth, whereto hee is said to haue got the Popes good furtherance. But whether by poyson or discontents, this great conceited Monarch left the Crowne of England where it gloriously stood, and laid his owne head in the graue of death.

Ed. Grim. lib. 10. pag. 619.

(166) And indeed so glorious was Elizabeths fame, growne now more potent by the Low-Countries engagements, that the Wise Statists of France feared, their owne Starre would be dimmed at the presence of her bright Sunne. For Henry their King, though hee made great shewes to doe much, both in the Church and Councell of State; in Feasts, in Maskes and in treading the measures of dances, dallied out both day and night in vnmeasurable delights: and yet the Clergy, to hold in their owne hands the reines of Church-gouernment, with Bels, Bookes, and Beads, sounded forth the zeale of his religious piety in the eares of their auditories: And to manage all temporall affaires at their owne dispose, the Queene Mother, and the Guize laid loose the bridle in his owne necke, not abridging his pleasures with their grauer aduices. But lest the English Maiden Queene should bee a mawle to the Churchmens Massings, or disturbe these State-guiders by claime (as she had done) of her owne right in France, the marriage motioned nine yeeres before, betwixt their Kings brother, Francis Valois Duke of Anjou, and Elizabeth Englands faire Queene, was againe sollicited, in hope by this match to make her wholly theirs, the better to establish their peace: and so effectually was the sute mooued, and so acceptably heard of her Maiesty, that the Monsieur came ouer in person to woo Her himselfe; though to the little liking of many Nobles, and great discontent to the Commons, as (amongst other appearances) was made knowne by a booke written against it, for which by reason of some personall and ouerlauish passages) the * Inditer lost his hand. But whether her Maiesty affected not marriage, nor disliked the man, or else out of her tender care not to giue the least griefe or distaste to her Subiects, iects, after moſt Princely and magnificent entertainment, ſhee let him depart without any promiſe of a nuptiall knot.

(167) The fame of this Duke was very renowned, and much the more by the Engliſh Queens fauours; in ſo much, that the diſtreſſed vnited Prouinces, after they had declared Philip of Auſtria (then King of Spain) by his too violent Gouernment againſt their priuiledges (whereunto he had ſworne) to be an enemy vnto their State and peace, and therfore vpon breach of couenants, to haue fallen from his intereſt among them, choſe this hopefull Monſieur to be their Protector, as a Prince moſt powerfull to defend their cauſe; of whoſe triumphes and French trecheries there, let Serres and Petit report for me.

(168) Hee dying in France (penitent and ſorrowfull for what hee had done) and William of Naſſau Prince of Orange (by an Edict from Spaine proclaimed a Traitor, his Lands and goods giuen to them that could bring him either dead or aliue, with a further reward of twenty fiue thouſand Crownes annuall) was firſt dangerouſly wounded in the face with a Piſtoll, and at laſt murthered with the like ſhot by the baſe hand of an odious Traitor at his Court in Delfe in Holland: whereupon the oppreſſed Prouinces once more ſued for reliefe, both to her Maieſty of England, as alſo vnto Henry the French King.

(169) Shee much diſliking the cruelties of Spaine, whoſe hands were thus dipt in the blood of this Prince, commended their cauſe vnto King Henry by an honorable * Ambaſſage. But hee finding himſelfe ouermaſtered at home, and in danger of the Guize and the league; himſelfe without forces, and theirs growne very ſtrong, recommended their diſtreſſes vnto Queene Elizabeth by his owne Ambaſſadour, promiſing her by the faith of a King, aſſiſtance for thoſe Netherlanders reliefe: and the like requeſt hee made vnto the King of Nauarre in their behalfes. Hereupon their Procurators were ſent into England, with full Commiſſion to diſpoſe of their Prouinces at the Queenes pleaſure.

(170) Her Councell then aſſembled to conferre of the buſineſſe, many weighty conſiderations amongſt them were mooued, and laſtly concluded, that her Maieſty ought to accept of the offer. The defence of Gods Goſpell was the firſt motiue, She being the nurſing mother of Chriſts diſtreſſed Saints: The Spaniſh Inquiſition, that without reſpect had perſecuted her Subiects contrary to right, was too cruell to bee tolerated: Philips army with flying colours ſent lately into Ireland vpon gift made vnto him by the Pope, with a purpoſe of the like enterprize for England, bewraied their intents; and laſtly, the hard meaſure that was to be expected for England, if the Spaniards ſeated in theſe neer Netherland Prouinces, was to bee preuented. Theſe important reaſons for her owne State, and pitty of theirs, mooued her Maieſty to become their Defender, but would in no wiſe take the Title of Soueraigne Lady thereof, which they would haue conferred vpon Her and her heires.

For which monies ſo diſburſed, the Towns of Fluſhing and Brill, with two Sconces, and the Caſtle of Ramekins in Holland, were deliuered to her Maieſties vſe in pledge, vntill the money were repayed: theſe Couenants were dated at Nonſuch the tenth of Auguſt in Anno 1585.

with the Engliſh, euen when they were ſeuerall; and not yet vnited together, as of late yeeres they haue beene, by intermarriages, and reduced vnder the gouernments of the Lords that ſucceeded in the Dukedome of Burgundy; betwixt whom and the Engliſh Kings, hath beene a continuall league, as alſo betwixt the naturall Subiects of both Countries, both of commerce for Merchants, as all other ſpeciall bonds of mutuall amitie. For teſtimony of which, there are extant ſundry Authentique treatiſes and tranſactions for mutuall commerce, intercourſe and ſtrait amity of ancient times; as betwixt King Henry the ſixth, and Philip the Second Duke of Burgundy; which was reuiued by Duke Charles his ſonne (Father to the King of Spaines Grandmother, and husband to the Lady Margaret, Siſter to King Edward the fourth) and againe confirmed by King Henry the ſeuenth and the Arch-Duke Philip, Grand-father to the King of Spaine. And of later yeeres betwixt King Henry the eight, and Charles the fifth, Emperour of Almaine, Father to Philip now King of Spaine. In all which treatiſes it was at all times ſpecially contained in expreſſe words, that the naturall people and Subiects of either ſide ſhould ſhew mutuall fauours and duties one to the other: But now Philip of Spaine departing the Low-Countries, and appointing Spaniards, Forreiners and Strangers, men exerciſed in warre, and delighted in blood, to bee chiefe Gouernours of all the ſaid Low-Countries, contrary to their ancient Lawes and cuſtomes, who vpon ambition, & for priuate lucre haue violently broken the Liberties, as the people alleage; and in a tyrannous ſort haue baniſhed, kill'd and deſtroyed within the ſpace of a few moneths many of the moſt ancient and principall perſons of the naturall Nobility, haue brought in inteſtine warres, made the Countrey in a manner deſolate by famine, ſword, and other exactions. So that the people are forced for the ſafety of their liues, to ſeeke the protection of other forraine Lords, or rather to yeeld themſelues wholy to the ſoueraignty of ſome mighty Monarch, as not onely by the ancient Lawes of their Countries they may, but euen by ſpeciall priuiledges granted to the people by ſome of the Lords and Dukes of the Prouinces, as they doe affirme, whereby they are free from their former homages, and at liberty to make choice of any other to bee their Prince and Head.

(174) Beſides theſe reaſons concerning them, the practices of Bernardin de Mendoza (Lieger Ambaſſador in England for Philip King of Spaine) who by the directions of Francis Throgmorton, contrined to bring in a forraine power to the deſtruction of Englands eſtate, it was not onely held a worke of piety to defend theſe diſtreſſed Chriſtians, but alſo a neceſſary policy to aide the Low-Countries Proteſtants with Englands ſupply, the better to impeach theſe dangerous aſſignes. And how ioyous her protection was to theſe Prouinces, the deliuery of Fluſhing with the Caſtle of Ramekins vnto Sir Philip Sidney, and the Brill vnto Sir Thomas Cecill, appointed by her Maieſty the Gouernours thereof, is witneſſed by the Letters of Prince Maurice himſelfe, wherein hee ſignified the great ioy and hopes that he conceiued, and his willing ſurrender of the ſame towne Fluſhing, being his patrimoniall inheritance.

(175) Things ordered thus among theſe great Potentates, Robert Dudley Baron of Denbigh, was the man, whom the Queene appointed to bee her Deputy Generall, honourable by birth, being the Duke of Northumberlands ſonne, by creation Earle of Leiceſter, and of the Order of the Garter, gracious in the eye of his Soueraigne, and ſufficiently ſorted with all courtly complements, who beeing accompanied with a gallant traine of Earles, Barons, and other great Perſonages of England, landed in Zeeland the nineteenth of December, and thence was honourably conuaied vnto Dunhage in Holland, where he was inſtalled, and the States tooke their Oath to the Queene, which no ſooner was accompliſhed, but that a ſuſpicion began to ariſe; vpon this occaſion,

(176) The States hauing drawne inſtructions of Councell for their Countries affaires, preſented the ſame to their new-made Gouernour, whoſe anſwer was, that ſuch inſtructions would proue limitations, which his authoritie now being abſolute, could no wayes indure: they greatly miſtruſting whereat he did ayme, bewayled the miſeries whereunto their Countrey ſeemed to bee brought, yet they ſuffered him to chooſe his Councellors of Eſtate, and to ſtampe his owne Armes both in their great and Counter-Seale: which when the Queene their Aſſiſter vnderſtood, ſhee was Troubles in Trafficke vpon the Seas.

(177) Things thus paſſing betwixt England and the Vnited Prouinces, the Engliſh Merchants Ships and goods were arreſted in Spaine, which cauſed many to leaue the Trade of Merchandizing, and to become men of Warre on the Seas, where alwayes the Spaniard, whoſoeuer wanne, went to the worſt. But on the Land, the Prince of Parma held Plea; for whoſe further ſafety Pope Sixtus the fift, ſent him a conſecrated Sword with a Hat, and to his men of Warre the Apoſtolicall bleſſing, with eternall life for them that ſhould dye in the Catholike Romiſh faith.

A conſecrated Sword ſent to Prince Parma.

(178) Another feare was blowne into the Netherlanders eares, which ſore troubled them, though without all cauſe, for it was divulged by ſiniſter reports, that Queene Elizabeth meant to make Peace with the King of Spaine, without either mention or regard for the ſafety of her vnited Confederates. Shee touched in honour, whereof ſhee was euer jealous, wrote Her Letters to Prince Parma in anſwer of his, that had mentioned the ſame, and to theſe doubtfull Netherlanders, to aſſure them the contrary, both which were dated from Richmond vpon one and the ſame day.

The feares of the diſtreſſed Netherlanders.

(179) Now Leiceſter not liking to lye ſtill, and doe nothing, made his preparation for Zutphen, which being in want of victuals, the Prince of Parma ſought to ſupply, to intercept which, Sir Iohn Norris was ſent, and to the ſaid ſeruice came the Earle of Eſſex, the Lord Willoughby, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir William Stanley, and Sir William Ruſſell, in all two hundred Horſe, and fifteene hundred Musketiers and Pikes: the Parma hauing ſeuen hundred horſe, and two thouſand foot, appointed with the like defence.

July 19. An. Dom. 1586.

(180) The day being darke through great foggy myſts, the Spaniard, whileſt their Waggons made forward, ſtayed in a place of aduantage neere vnto Zutphen, vpon whom the Engliſh were entred before they were aware, and were entertained with a furious charge of ſhot, which notwithſtanding they abode, and ſo valiantly followed the skirmiſh, that they ouerthrew a Cornet of horſe, and tooke Creſier the Captaine thereof priſoner, and after him Count Hannibal Gonzaga, another Cornet alſo they put backe and ſlew. But in this the day was made vnfortunate, that the worthy Sir Philip Sidney, as hee changed his horſe, was ſhot by a Musket aboue the left knee, which ſo ſhiuered the thigh-bone, that the Bullet could not be recouered, of which wound he dyed fiue and twenty dayes after, to the no little griefe of her Maieſty, and many others, for the great hopes they had of that worthy Gentleman; in whom were compleat all vertues and valours that could be required or reſiding in man.

A conflict at Zutphen.

Sir Philip Sidney ſhot with a Musket, whereof hee dyed.

(181) Good ſeruice done vpon the Sconces neere Zutphen, ſo that the Town ſeemed to be blocked vp; his Excellency (ſo did they now enſtile the Earle) made Rowland Yorke the Gouernour thereof, and ouer Deuenter Sir William Stanley, to the great diſcontents of the Eſtates, for that Yorke had beene a double Traytor in ſeruice, and Stanley beforetime had ſerued the Spaniard. Other grieuances alſo they then began to complaine of, and by petition to his Excellency ſought the redreſſe; but hee minding for England, with faire words held them in expectance, vntill ſuch time as he ſhould returne againe.

Yorke and Stanley made Gouernours of Townes.

(182) The State-Souldiers found themſelues agrieued, that they were not dealt with according to cuſtome, degrees or deſert, (as that the Sergeant ſhould bee aduanced to be Enſigne, the Enſigne, Sergeant Major, and ſo vpward) they venturing their liues to winne reputation. And the Earle of Holocke held himſelfe much wronged, in that Sir Edward Norris vpon words ſpoken at Table, ſent him a Letter of challenge to fight with him body to body; the Earle then lying ſicke of a wound receiued at Zutphen, which hee diſdainfully tooke, as being his vnequall, and partly imputed it to the ſufferance of his Excellency. But more neerely touched the loſſe of Deuenter and Sconce at Zutphen, Trayterouſly ſold vnto the Spaniard by Sir William Stanley, and Rowland Yorke, Engliſhmen, whom Leiceſter had left there at his departure. Theſe things droue the Councell of State into many jealouſies, that the Engliſh entended as the French had done.

The body of the deplored Queene was ſolemnly interred in the Cathedrall Chuch of Peterborow, where it remained vnder a Hearſe of blacke veluet. But by his Maieſties appointment was thence remooued vnto the Collegiate Church of Saint Peters in Weſtminſter, and in the moſt magnificent Chappell of King Henry the eight interred vnder a Princely Monument of white marble, with her picture according to life artificially imitated by ſculpture.

(184) In this abſence of Leiceſter, euery ſeuerall Captaine tooke vpon him the place of a Generall, whereby many deſperate ſeruices were attempted, and great robbery by their Souldiers committed, ſo that it was feared all would come to ruine. To preuent which, a Councell for State was aſſembled at Dunhage, where Maurice Naſſau, the younger Sonne of William Prince of Orange was elected their Gouernour, and the Prouinces ſworne vnto him, with a reſeruation had vnto her Maieſty; when alſo a great complaint was ſent into England, which to examine, the Lord Buckhurſt was ſent into Holland; at whoſe doings Leiceſter tooke offence, but eſpecially againſt Sir Iohn Norris (that renowned Leader) whom, to the great diſlike of the States, he cauſed to be recalled, and ſent into Ireland.

(185) Leiceſter the Lord Generall hoping to recouer his well-nigh loſt reputation, landed in Zeeland, gallantly accompanied, where hee made a forward ſhew of great ſeruice; but ſuch was the ſucceſſe, that Sluce was ſurrendred, and the occaſion thereof partly imputed to him; when alſo began many factious abettings betwixt the Eſtates and his Excellency, ſo that ſome Townes vtterly reiected his gouernment, and hee againe ſought to ſeyze vpon ſome other.

(186) The care of preuenting further miſchiefes, mooued her Majeſty hereupon to recall the Earle of Leiceſter into England, well knowing, that a Kingdome diuided could not long ſtand: who on his returne, ſhee commanded to reſigne his gouernment of the Netherlanders into the hands of the Generall Eſtates, which was performed by Act, ſigned vnder his hand, and ſent vnto them: which Reſignation receiued, was preſently proclaimed thorow all the Prouinces, to the end that euery man might know himſelfe diſcharged of his oath to the Earle of Leiceſter.

(187) Now Philip King of Spaine eſpying theſe diſſentions, thought it a fit aduantage for him to worke vpon, hauing a long time proiected an attempt for England, and at that time preparing a mighty Nauy vpon the Seas. To caſt therefore a myſt ouer her Maieſties eyes, and to driue all iealouſies out of her head, hee importuned by all meanes the Realmes vnto peace. Shee meaſuring other Princes by her own true-meaning, and peacefull diſpoſitions, gaue eare to his guilefull Lullaby, without ſuſpition of any Snake to be hid in ſo flowry a garden; and therefore ſent to the Eſtates to vnderſtand their reſolution for an vniuerſall peace, proteſting that if they ſtood out, ſhee would withdraw her whole forces from thence.

Spain contriues warre vnder the falſe profers of peace.

Q. Elizabeth deſirous of peace.

(188) They, like themſelues, anſwered with a bold denyall, neither thought they that ſhee could haue any peace with him that was head of the holy League, and perſecuted the exerciſe of the reformed Religion, whoſe policy (as they feared) was but to detract time, till his Sea-prouiſions were better ripened, as indeede the ſequell ſoone prooued. The terror of this prepared, and Inuincible Nauy (as the Spaniards tearmed it) ſpreading it ſelfe wide, and menacing fearefull ſtormes both vnto the Engliſh and Flemiſh; the Eſtates like prouident reſpecters of themſelues, and thankfull men to their Protectreſſe, prepared their ſhips of warre to aſſiſt her Maieſty, and preſſed a thouſand ſailers of the Netherlanders for her ſeruice on Seas.

to Ostend. For her Maiesty were assigned Henry Earle of Derby, William Lord Cobham, Warden of the Cinque-Ports, with Sir Iames Croft, and others. For King Philip, were Maximilian Earle of Aremberg, Gouernour of Antwerpe, Monsieur Richardot, President of Artois, and Councellor of State, besides other Ciuillians. These stayed at Bruges, and by messages to and fro much time was spent for precedency of place, where they should meet, and what hostages should be giuen for securitie of sides; yet lastly, the English had the priority, and the place was Ostend.

Variance for precedency.

(190) The demand of the Queene was, to haue a surcease of Armes, with a present and vndelayed truce, mistrusting the Kings preparation at Sea. The sending away of forraine souldiers out of the Low-Countries for Englands safety. A restitution of such summes of money as the Queene had lent vnto the Estates, which the King had promised by his Edict made at Brusels. That the Netherlanders might enioy their ancient liberties and priuiledges, nor be gouerned by a Stranger, but by a Natiue Prince. That the Religion might bee permitted for two yeeres at least. And lastly; that the Articles of Pacification of Gant, and other like Treaties might bee obserued. And these being concluded; the Townes shee possessed, should bee deliuered vpon such reasonable conditions, as all the world should witnesse, shee tooke them not to her owne vse or commodity, but onely vpon a necessary defence and assurance.

The Queenes demands.

The reasonable offers of the English Queene.

(191) To these the Spaniards replyed, that touching their preparation for Sea, they did assure them it nothing concerned England. To send away their Souldiers, their King could not resolue; vntill that the Netherlanders had submitted themselues vnto him. Concerning their priuiledges, it appertained nothing to the Queene, neither should shee prescribe to the King a law. And so farre was hee from tolerating Religion, that hee would not heare thereof, otherwise then he had allowed vnto other Townes that had submitted vnto his obedience: and the like answer made they for the Pacification of Gant.

The Spanish shifts and answers.

(192) The propositions further vrged, and answered with dilatory delayes, Pope Sixtus the fift (the prime man in the intended Tragedy) obseruing well the time, among other beasts sent foorth his Bull to thunder out bolts against Englands Queen, confirming the Excommunications of his two Predecessors, and depriuing her Maiesty from all Princely dignitie; for whose finall dispossession, hee then ordained his Catholike sonne Philip of Spaine, commanding all her Subiects, vpon paine of his curse, (oh fearefull bugge-beare!) to ayde and assist the great, noble, and Inuincible Army, prepared to that end vnder the command of the Duke of Parma. And Allen an Englishman, an eager Trumpeter to this exploit, now purposely made Cardinall by the Pope (to shew his Holy affection to the English Nation) would not lye idle, but set himselfe on worke to write a Booke exhortatory to the Nobility of England and Ireland, to rowze them vp to the execution of the Popes sentence against their Soueraigne, in assisting King Philip, who was made the whip in his Holinesse hand, and the Duke of Parma, who was appointed the chiefe Commander in that action, which Booke (fraught with all impudency of diuellish slanders against Her sacred person) was printed at Antwerpe in Anno 1588.

The Popes Bull sent forth against England.

Cardinall Allens traiterous Libell.

(193) This Bull and Booke comming to the Queenes knowledge; she sent vnto Parma (who had gained the reputation of some Princely vertues) to deale plainly with her; if so, then meant shee no longer to continue the treaty of peace: but he with many Courtly complements denyed his authoritie, neither had seene (as he said) any such prescripts. Moreouer the English Commissioners pressed the conditions, purposely to find some footsteps of this close-carried designe, when at last it burst forth in these termes, That the King of Spaine had kept fifty thousand men in pay almost a whole yeere, to lye still and doe nothing; to his great charge by the meanes of that treaty. At which very instant, these their hidden traps and toyles apparently shewed themselues, when the Seas were turretted with such a Nauy of Ships; as her swelling waues could hardly be seene, and the Flagges, Streamers, and Ensignes so spred in the winde, that they seemed to darken euen the Sunne, which put the English Commissioners in some suspition and feare, hauing no hostages for their safe-returne.

The Queene sent to Prince Parma.

The wonderfull and great prouisions in the Spanish Armado.

(195) Admirable (as ye see) was the prouision of this mighty Armado, and so confident was the Spaniard that England should pay the whole shot, that no cost of any thing was at all spared; of bullets for great shot were two hundred and twenty thousand; of Powder foure thousand and two hundred Kintals, euery Kintall containing a hundred weight; of Lead for Bullets one thousand Kintals, and one thousand and two hundred Kintals of Match; seuen thousand Muskets and Calivers, ten thousand Partizans and Halberts, with murthering Peeces, double Cannons, and field Peeces for Campe; with store of furniture for carriages, Mules and Horses, so that they were sufficiently prouided both for Sea and Land. Bread and Bisket was baked, and Wine laid aboord for sixe moneths prouision; sixe thousand and fiue hundred kintals of Bacon, three thousand of Cheese, besides Flesh, Rice, Beanes, Pease, Oyle, and Vineger, with twelue thousand Pipes of fresh Water, store they had of Torches, Lanthornes, and Lampes, Canvas, Hides, and Lead to stop leakes, Whips, & butchery Kniues; for what vse we may imagine. In a word, by the report of Don Diego Piementell, the Army was two and thirty thousand strong, and cost the King of Spaine thirty thousand Ducats euery day.

Their Regiments.

(196) In this Army were fiue Regiments of old Spanish Souldiers, of the Tertios, of Naples, Sicily, and the Terceraes, commanded by fiue Masters Del Campo; The first was Don Diego de Piementell, a Knight of the Order of Saint Iohn, brother to the Marquesse of Taueras, and Cousin to the Earle of Beneuent & Calui. The second Colonell was Don Francisco de Toledo, brother to the Earle of Orgas: the third Don Alonzo de Luzon: the fourth fourth, Don Nicholas de Isla, or Patritio Anselmo: and the fift, was Augustin Mexia, brother to the Marquesse de la Garda, who was afterwards made Gouernour of Antwerp; each company hauing in his Regiment two and thirty companies, besides the Castilians and Portugals bands, each of them hauing their peculiar Gouernours, Captaines, Officers, Colours, and Weapons.

Their Generall.

(197) The Generall of this mightie Army, was Don Lodouicus Perez, Duke of Medina Sidonia, Baron of Saint Lucas, of the Order of the Golden Fleece. The Admirall was Don Iohn Martinez de Richald, the Marshall Don Francisco Bouadille: and the chiefe Councellers for the warre, were Diego Piementell, Floris de Valdea, Pedro de Valdez, Michael Oquendo, Don Alanzo de Lieua, Don Diego Maldonado, and Don Georgio Manriquez. Don Martin Alorcon was ordained Vicar Generall for the holy Inquisition, in whose traine were a hundred Monkes and Iesuites: and Cardinall Allen was appointed the Super-intendent of all Ecclesiasticall matters thorowout England; who fearing to be ouer-taken with time, translated Pope Sixtus his Bull into English, that it might bee the sooner published vpon the arriuall of the Spanish Fleete into that Kingdome. Of voluntary aduenturers, were an hundred, twenty foure, Noblemen, and Gentlemen of great account; all of them furnished at their owne charges: among whom was the Prince of Ascoli, Alonzo de Leiua, the Marquesse of Pennafiel, the Marquesse de Ganes, the Marquesse de Barlango, the Count de Paredes, the Count de Yeluas, and diuers other Marquesses and Earles of Honourable Families of Mendoza, Toledo, Pachieco, Cordouas, Guzma, and Manricques; neither was there any Noble House of Spaine, but had a sonne, brother, or nephew in the voyage, in hope of reuenewes and riches in England.

(198) Nor was the Duke of Parma slacke in the businesse; who lying in readinesse to ioyne his forces with this Nauy, set many thousands on worke to build Ships, to dig & deepen Riuers for Saile from Antwerpe to Gaunt, and to Bruges, lading three hundred small Boates with Munition and Victuals; as also prepared seuenty others flat bottomed, euery one able to beare thirty Horses for transportation, with Bridges ready made to ship and vnship them. Two hundred more were made of the like fashion, though not so bigge, and lay ready in the Hauen of Newport; at Dunkirke lay thirty seuen ships of warre, wherein store of pyles were bestowed, sharpened at the end with yron Pykes, to pyle vp the mouthes of Riuers; and at Graueling hee had prouided twenty thousand emptie Caskes, with Cords, and other furniture fit to make floating Bridges to stop vp the Hauens. Hee likewise had shipped great abundance of Saddles, Bridles, with all other furniture for Horse; and Horses also for carriage, with Ordnance, and other prouisions of warre.

(199) Neere vnto Newport hee had lying vnder the Command of Camillo, thirtie Companies of Italians, two of Wallons, and eight of Burguinois, euery Company being an hundred men. At Dyxmew he mustered fourescore Companies of Netherlanders, threescore of Spaniards, threescore of high Dutch, and seuen of rebellious fugitiue English, whereof Sir William Stanley was Generall; at Corricke also were foure thousand lodged, and at Watene nine hundred Horse, ouer whom the Marquesse of Guast was Commander. And to this Land-seruice came the Duke of Pastrana, supposed to bee the Spanish Kings base sonne: the Marquesse of Bourgon, one of the Archduke Ferdinands sonnes, Don Vespasian Gonsagua of the House of Mantua, a great Souldier, who had been Viceroy of Spaine, Don Iohn de Medices, Bastard of Florence, Don Amedeus, Bastard of Sauoy, with many others of the like estate.

(200) Neither must you thinke, that Sixtus Quintus the Pope of Rome, did in any wise neglect his diligence and deuotion to this intended inuasion; whose helping hand was shewed, in sending forth his Crusado (as hath been vsed against the Turkes) and publishing a safe passport for his Philipians to enter into England. Who also for the furtherance of the enterprize, vndertook to contribute a million of gold, the halfe presently, and the other when any notable Hauen in that Land should be wonne; with this prouiso notwithstanding (most wisely inserted) that hee should hold the English Crowne as feudatory vnto the See of Rome; in earnest whereof, he bestowed vpon him his Apostolicall benediction, and the Title of the Defender of the Faith: so liberall was he, both in his temporall and spirituall largesses, & so forward was Philip to catch at Elizabeths still flourishing Crowne.

But her vndanted heart in this preſent danger, as another Ezekiah, ſought vnto the Lord, whoſe Anointed ſeruant ſhee was, and who euer had beene her onely defendant. And for preuenting thoſe long threatned ſtormes, ſhee ſent Charles Howard, Lord Baron of Effingham, High Admirall of England, vnto the Seas, where the Lord Henry Seymer kept betwixt Callis and Douer, ſeconded by the Ships of the vnited Prouinces, in league with the Queene.

Their French King giues notice to the Queene of the preparation.

(201) The French King, who euer honoured and admired Queene Elizabeths great and gracious vertues, hauing more particular intelligences that this great preparation was made againſt England, gaue ſpeedy and ſecret notice thereof to her Maieſty; whereupon ſhee commanded the generall Forces of the Realme in their ſeuerall Shires to be muſtered, trayned, and put in readineſſe for the defence of the whole; which accordingly was done, and whereof the Lord Robert Dudley, Earle of Leiceſter, and Steward of her Houſhold, was appointed Lieutenant.

(202) The Inuincible Nauie, and terrour of Europe, as the Papals both termed, and tooke it to be, hauing all things prepared, looſed Anchor from Lisbon, vpon the nineteenth of May, and made vnto the Groine in Gallicia, it being the neereſt Hauen to England, whence hoyſing ſayles with great hope and pride, bent their courſe thitherward: but ſuddenly the Heauens hating ſuch hoſtile actions, powred downe reuenge, by a ſore and vnexpected tempeſt, which draue the Duke of Medina, the chiefe Generall backe againe into the Groine; eight other of their ſhips being diſperſed on Seas, their Maſts broken and blowne ouer-boord; beſides three Portingall Gallies which fell vpon the Coaſt of Bayon in France, and were ſet vpon by their owne ſlaues, whereof Dauid Gwyn an Engliſhman was the firſt, who with his fellowes both French and Turkes, freed themſelues by the ſlaughter of many Spaniards, among whom, Don Diego de Mandrana, was one.

(203) Charles Howard, Lord Admirall, hearing for certaine that their Fleete was ready to hoyſe vp their ſayles, had ſent the worthy Sir Francis Drake, who was conſtituted his Vice-Admirall, vnto the Weſt parts, with fifty ſixe Ships well appointed, whither himſelfe alſo following with ſpeed, and ioyning his Fleete, their number amounted to one hundred Ships, whereof fifteene were Victuallers, and nine Voluntaries of Deuonſhire Gentlemen; many a ſeruiceable man returning backe for lacke of imployment or place. Theſe from Plymouth reſoluing and * aſſaying to put forth to Seas, were ſo met with the wind, that paſt the Syllies they could not attaine, and thence alſo were forced by tempeſt into the Hauen, (from whence they lanched) to refreſh their Ships and Companies; where lying at Anker, the Scouts at Sea had deſcryed ſome Sayles of the Spaniards, which had beene likewiſe diſtreſſed by the ſtormes; but before theſe could bee haled, the wind came about, and brought them to the Groine, where the reſt lay in Harbour.

Iune 6.

(204) Intelligence ſpreading that the Spaniards were in want, their great Ships diſperſed, the reſt ſtorme-ſhaken, and their men by multitudes dying with the peſtilence; the Lord Admirall meant to vſe the aduantage vpon the firſt Northwinde, which came about the eight day of Iuly, and bare his Sayle almoſt within ſight of Spaine, when ſuddenly it changing into the South, and he wiſely foreſeeing, that the enemy might paſſe without his diſcouery, that the Seas might be ſtormy, and his Fleet wind-bound, and that whileſt they thus lay abroad, their ſeruice much better might be imployed at home, hee therefore preſently returned, and Ankered his Fleet in the Hauen of Plymouth, ſuffering his men to relieue themſelues on Land.

Iuly 8.

(205) But the Spaniards Ships new rigged, and their wants ſupplyed, their King ſtill

The Spaniards againe ſet forth.

ſtill hot on his former reſolutions, inſtantly vrged and haſtened his Chiefetaines to put againe to Sea, which accordingly was done vpon the eleuenth of Iuly, waying their Ankers at the Groin, where with braue ſhewes, and full Sayles they came into the Chanels of the narrow Seas, where they caſt anker, and diſpatched certain ſmall Pinnaces vnto the Duke of Parma, to ſignifie their arriuall and readineſſe, and to command him in the name of the King to forward his charge for that ſeruice.

The Engliſh haue notice of their approch.

(206) The Engliſh Fleete being in Harbour, and many men on ſhore, Captaine Thomas Fleming (ſome ſay a Pyrate) deſcried the Spaniard vpon the point of the Lizard, the wind being then South and by Weſt: He haſtening to Plimouth, made relation thereof vnto the Lord Admirall: the newes was more fearefull, for that it was ſudden, the Queene hauing receiued intelligence for certaine, that this great Armado would not come forth that yeere, their Bulkes being ſo diſperſed and bruiſed, and their wants and ſickeneſſe ſo great, vpon which raſh reports (a dangerous matter in State-affaires,) ſo confident Shee was, that Shee ſent for foure of Her talleſt royall Ships to bee brought againe vnto Chattam; but Flemings vnexpected diſcouery hindred that purpoſe, and all hands were ſet on worke to warpe out the Ships, the wind blowing hard, and hindering the ſame.

Iuly 20.

(207) The next day about noone, this terrible Fleet was deſcryed by the Engliſh, who with a Southweſt wind came forward amaine, and (as ſeemed) they made for Plimouth. But whether their Commiſſion were otherwiſe, or for that they ſaw the Engliſh Ships out of the Harbour, they paſſed by towards Callis, well hoping about thoſe Coaſts to meet with Prince Parma, by whoſe waffing that way, the Engliſh got the wind, and eftſoones gaue them chaſe, and encounter, where fire, ſmoake, and ecchoing Cannons began the parley, and Bullets moſt freely enterchanged betwixt them, were meſſengers of each others minde.

The Engliſh aſſaile the Spaniſh.

Iuly 21.

(208) The next day the two Fleetes fought within Musket ſhot, where the Engliſh Admirall fell moſt hotly on the Vice-Admirall of Spain, at which preſent they wel perceiued their own ouerſights; their great Ships (like Caſtles) powerfull to defend, but not offend, to ſtand, but not to mooue; and therefore farre vnfit for fight in thoſe narrow Seas: their enemies nimble, and ready at all ſides to annoy them, and as apt to eſcape harmes themſelues, by being low built, and eaſily ſhot ouer. Therfore they gathered themſelues cloſe in forme of a halfe Moone, & ſlackned their Sayles, that their whole Fleete might keepe together. Notwithſtanding, one of their great Gallions, wherein was Don Pedro de Valdez, Vaſques de Silua, Alõzo de Sayas, & other Noblemen, was ſore battered by the Engliſh ſhot; in auoyding wherof, ſhe fell foule vpon another ſhip, & ere ſhe could be cleared, had her fore Maſt broken off, which ſo hindred her ſayle, that ſhee was vnable to keepe way with the Fleet, nor they of courage to ſuccor theſe Lords, but left both ſhip & them, in this ſudden and vnlooked for diſtreſſe. But night comming on, and ſhee lagging behind, the Lord Admiral ſuppoſing neither men nor Mariners to be left within boord, and fearing to loſe ſight of the Spaniards, paſt by, & followed the Lanthorne, which he tooke to be borne by Sir Francis Drake, but that renowned Knight, buſied vpon fiue great Hulkes, purſued them amain, which being haled, were found to be Eaſterlings, and thereupon freed from his further harmes.

A Gallion diſtreſſed.

(209) The next day following, Sr. Francis Drake eſpying this lagging Gallion, ſent forth a Pinnace to cõmand them to yeeld, otherwiſe his Bullets ſhould force them without further fauour; but Valdez to ſeeme valorous, anſwered; that they were foure hundred and fifty ſtrong; that himſelfe was Don Pedro, and ſtood on his honour, and thereupon propounded certaine conditions. But the Knight ſent his reply, that he had not leiſure to parley: if he would yeeld, preſently doe it; if not, he ſhould well prooue that Drake was no daſtard; whereupon Pedro hearing that it was the fiery Drake, (euer terrible to the Spaniards) who had him in chaſe, with 40. of his followers, came on boord Sir Francis his Ship; where firſt giuing him the Conge, he proteſted, that he, and all his, were reſolued to die in defence, had they not falne vnder his power, whoſe valour & felicity was ſo great, that Mars and Neptune ſeemed to attend him in his attempts, and whoſe generous minde towards the vanquiſhed, had often beene experienced, euen of his greateſt foes. Sir Francis requiting his Spaniſh cõplements with honorable Engliſh curteſies, placed him at his owne Table, and lodged him in his owne Cabbin. The reſidue of that compacompany were ſent vnto Plymouth, where they remained eighteene moneths, till their ranſomes were paid; but Sir Francis his Souldiers had well paid themſelues with the ſpoyle of the Shippe, wherein were 55. thouſand Ducats in gold, which they ſhared merrily among them. The ſame day Michael de Oquenda, Admirall to the Quadron Guypuſco, and Vice-Admirall to the whole Fleet, ſuffered no leſſe diſaſter, whoſe ſhip being one of the greateſt Gallions, fell ſuddenly on fire, all the vpper part of the Ship, and moſt of the perſons therein conſumed, howbeit, the Gun-powder in the Hold was all ſaued, and the reſt of the ſcorched Spaniards with the Hulke brought into Plymouth, to the great joy of the beholders.

Iuly 23. (210) Vpon Tueſday the twentie third of Iuly, the Spaniards approaching right againſt Portland, the wind came about into the North, as fit as could be wiſhed to further their deſignes; but the Engliſh agill, and fore-ſeeing all harmes, recouered the aduantage thereof from the Spaniards, and continued that day from morning till night, in battering thoſe vaſt woodde Caſtles with ſhot both great and ſmall; which forced them for their further ſafety, to gather themſelues cloſe into a rundell, their beſt and greateſt Ships ſtanding without, ſecuring the battered and leſſe. On this day the ſoreſt fight was performed: wherin, beſides other remarkeable harmes, a great Venetian Ship, with ſome other ſmaller, were ſurprized, and taken by the Engliſh.

Iuly 24. (211) The foure and twenty day of this preſent Moneth, the fight was onely betweene the foure great Galliaſſes, and the Engliſh Ships, the Spaniards hauing the aduantage, theirs being rowed, and our Sayles vnfilled, by reaſon of the calme, which notwithſtanding they ſore galled the enemy with chaine ſhot, therewith cutting aſunder their tacklings, cables, and cordage, to their no little annoyance. But wanting powder, which ſo freely they had ſpent, they ſent men on Land for a further ſupply, which miniſtred diſlikes (if not ſuſpitions) to many, that we ſhould thus want vpon our own Coaſts. In which Interim, a Councell was called, wherein it was decreed that the Engliſh Fleete ſhould be diuided into foure Squadrons, and thoſe committed to foure worthy Captaines, and moſt skilfull Nauigators, whereof the Admirall in the Arke Royall was chiefe, Sir Francis Drake in the Reuenge led the ſecond, Captaine Hawkins the third, and Captaine Frobiſher the fourth. Other moſt valiant Captaines there were in her Maieſties Ships, as the Honourable Lord Thomas Howard in the Lyon, the Lord Sheffield in the Beare, Sir Robert Southwell in the Elizabeth Ionas, Captaine Baker in the Victory, and Captaine George Fenner in the Galeon Leiceſter.

(212) The fiue and twenty of Iuly, the Spaniards were arriued againſt the Ile of Wight, where was a terrible encounter, each ſhooting off their whole ſides, and not aboue ſixeſcore yards the one from the other; till at length the Engliſh ſo battered the Spaniſh high Turrets, that they were forced once more to ſecure themſelues in a rundell, and the foreſaid Generals ſo worthily bare themſelues in this conflict, that the Lord Admirall beſtowed the Order of Knight-hood vpon the Lords, Howard, and Sheffield, Maſter Iohn Hawkins, Martin Frobiſher, and others. And yet (by the Spaniſh brags) a falſe rumour was ſpred in France, that England was wholly conquered by the Spaniard. Iuly 25.

(213) Their Fleet making forward about Sunſet, the 27. of the ſame Moneth, came againſt Douer, and ankered within ſight of Callis, intending for Dunkerk, there to ioyne with the Duke of Parma his Forces, without which, they well ſaw they could doe nothing. The Engliſh Fleete following vp hard vpon them, caſt anker ſo neere, that they lay within Culuering ſhot. Where the Lord Henry Seymer vnited his to the Lord Admirals Ships. Meane-while the Duke of Medina ſent vnto Parma, to bid him make ready his long-expected forces; with which meſſengers many Noblemen of the Spaniards went on Land, among whom was the Prince of Aſcoli, the Kings baſe ſonne, who ſo well liked his ſhipping, that he made no great haſte againe from ſhore: wherein hee was onely fortunate; for that his Gallion was caſt away vpon the Iriſh coaſt, and neuer returned to ſalute Spaine. Iuly 27.

(214) Duke Parma hearing the beſt of this voyage, makes all things ready that lay in his charge; whoſe hopes were ſo fixed for Englands Conqueſt, that the glittering Diadem vpon Queene Elizabeths Head, dazeled his ambitious eye, being aſſured by Cardinall Allen, that he was the man deſigned to be crowned therewith, and who, from the Pope and and Spaine ſhould hold that Kingdome himſelfe. Wherefore thinking his Coronet of the Low-Countries Gouernment, would but trouble the Engliſh Crowne, and both too weighty to be worne vpon one Head, hee committed that charge vnto Count Mansfield the Elder, and making his vowes vnto Saint Mary of Hall in Henault, was already in conceit no leſſe then a King. But ſoone the date of his raigne was expired, and his ſwelling tyde falne into a low ſhallow ebbe; for the day following in his march towards Dunkerke, he heard the thundring Ordnance ring the paſſing peale of his ſtile and Title, and the ſame euening had newes of the hard ſucceſſe of the Spaniards, the hoped aduancers of his dreamed fortunes.

The Fleete diſanchored from Callis by ſtratagem.

(215) They lying then at anker neere Callis, to ioyne their powers with Parmaes, were forced thence by a politike ſtratagem thus: Their Ships, as Caſtles pitched in the Seas, had their bulkes ſo planked with great beames, that bullets might ſtrike, and ſticke, but neuer paſſe thorow, ſo that little auayled the Engliſh Cannon, except onely in playing on their maſts and tackling; whereupon, by her Maieſties aduice and appointment, eight of the Engliſh Ships were diſcharged of men, and filled with Gun-powder, pitch, brimſtone, and other combuſtible matter; their Ordnance charged with bullets, ſtones, chaines, and the like; which vpon Sunday, the eight and twentie of Iuly, at two of the clocke after midnight, were let driue with wind and tyde among the Spaniſh Fleete, whoſe Pylots returning, and their traines taking fire, ſuch a ſudden thunder-clap was giuen, that the Spaniards affrighted in the dead of the night, were ſtricken into a horrible feare, leſt all their Ships ſhould be fired by theſe; which preſent miſchiefe to auoid, in great perplexity, they haſted to cut their owne Cables, the time being too ſhort to weigh vp their Ankers; and hoyſing their ſayles, did driue at randome into the Seas, in which haſte and confuſion, the greateſt of their Galliaſſes fell foule vpon another Ship, and loſt her Rudder, ſo that guideleſſe ſhee droue with the tyde vpon a ſhelue in the ſhoare of Callis, where ſhee was aſſaulted by the Engliſh.

A Galliaſſe taken.

(216) This Galliaſſe was of Naples; her Generall Hugh de Moncado, who fought the more valiantly in hope of preſent reſcue of the Prince of Parma; but Sir Amias Preſton gaue ſo fierce an aſſault, that Moncado was ſhot dead with a bullet, and the Galliaſſe boorded, wherein was many a Spaniard ſlaine, and a number of the reſt leaping into the Sea, were drowned; yet Don Antonio de Matiques, a principall Officer, had the hap to eſcape; and was the firſt man that brought into Spaine the welcomes of this nowvincible Nauy. This huge Bottome, manned with foure hundred Souldiers, and three hundred ſlaues, had in her alſo fifty thouſand Ducats of the Spaniſh Kings treaſure, a booty well fitting the Engliſh Souldiers affections; who hauing ranſacked all, and freed the ſlaues from their miſerable fetters, went about to ſet that veſſell of Emptineſſe on fire; but Monſieur Guordon, the Gouernour of Callis, fearing ſome danger to the Towne or Hauen, would not permit them, but diſcharged his Ordnance againſt ſuch as aſſayed it.

(217) The morning after this their miſerable hap, ranging themſelues againe into order, they approched ouer againſt Greueling, where once againe the Engliſh getting the winde, the Spaniſh were thereby depriued of the Conueniency of Callis roade, and kept from ſupply out of Dunkerke; in which Port had reſted their full hope of ſupport. Notwithſtanding, they were forced to paſſe by, and ſo followed by the Engliſh, that their Ships charged vpon them from morning till night, the conflict prouing diſmall to the inuincible Armado; for therein a great Gallion of Biſcay periſhed, the Captaines thereof, to auoid ignominy, or to bee accounted valorous, deſperately flew each others; in which diſtreſſe alſo two other great Ships preſently ſunke. The Saint Philip, and Saint Matthew, two Portugal Gallions were ſo torne with ſhot, their tacklings ſpent, and their bulkes rent, that the water entred in on all ſides; in the former of which, was Francis de Toledo, being Colonell ouer two and thirty Bands, who taking his courſe for the Coaſt of Flanders, the leake was ſo great, that he with others, committing themſelues to the Skiffe, arriued at Oſtend, and the Ship, with the reſidue, were taken by the Vliſhingers.

Iuly 29.

A Gallion taken.

(218) In the Saint Mathew was embarked Don Diego Pimentelli, Campemaſter, and Colonell alſo of thirty two Bands; whoſe ſhip, though very ſtrong, was ſo pierced with ſhot, that her Leakes could not be ſtopt, which knowne, the Duke of Medina ſent his Skiffe for him, and ſome others, to ſaue themſelues from their eminent danger. But hee, vpon a Spaniſh braue, refuſed ſo to doe, aſſaying each way to free himſelfe like a Souldier; but not able to keepe ſayle with the Fleete, he forth-with made toward the Coaſt of Flanders, where being eſpyed by fiue men of warre, was met with, and required to yeeld, which laſtly hee did vnto Captaine Peter Banderdueſſe, who carried him into Zeland, where, for a trophy of Victory, his Banner was hung vp in the Church of Leyden in Holland, whoſe length reached from the very roofe vnto the ground: and another Ship of leſſe burthen, coaſting alſo for Flanders, was caſt away on the ſands.

(219) The Spaniards now finding their BVENVENIDA vnto England farre other then they expected, were content to couch their Fleete cloſe together, not ſeeking to aſſayle, but to defend; and the winde comming to the South-weſt, in the ſame order paſſed by Dunkerke, whom the Engliſh ſtill followed. But leſt Parma ſhould play vpon aduantage, the Lord Admirall diſpatched the Lord Henry Seymer, with his Squadron of ſmall Ships, vnto the Coaſt of Flanders, to ſecond thoſe Hollanders which there kept watch vnder the conduct of Iuſtin Naſſau their Admirall: whoſe Nauy conſiſted of thirty fiue Ships, furniſhed with moſt skilfull Mariners, and old experienced Souldiers, whereof twelue hundred were Mucketiers, whom the States had culled out of the Garriſons. Their charge was, to ſtop all entrance into their Hauens, or entercourſe with Dunkerke, whither Duke Parma intended, though his men were vnwilling, hearing how their friends were welcome at the Sea, onely the Engliſh fugitiues, about ſeuen hundred, vnder the command of that treacherous Knight, Sir William Stanley, were very forward to bee the firſt that ſhould aſſault England.

The Hollanders Aydes.

Engliſh fugitiues prooue the moſt deſperate enemies.

(220) But the Armado being now paſſed the place of their expected ſupply, and hauing gotten more Sea-roome for their huge-bodied Bulkes, * ſpred their maine ſayles, and made away as faſt as winde and water would giue them leaue, more fearing the ſmall Fleete and forces of the Engliſh, (though nothing in number like vnto them) then ſtanding vpon termes of honour, either of their Chieftaines or Inuincible Nauy. But ſurely, if they had knowne the want of powder that ours ſuſtained, (a fault vnexcuſable vpon our owne Coaſts) they no doubt would haue ſtood longer to their tacklings: but God in this, as the reſt, would haue vs to acknowledge, that wee were onely deliuered by his owne gracious Prouidence and Arme, and not by any policy or power of our owne.

* Iuly 30.

(221) The Vincible Armado, holding on their way, the Engliſh Admirall followed, leſt they ſhould aſſay to put into Scotland; but the wind comming faire, and feare of more encounters, with all their ſayles ſpred, they betooke themſelues to flight, leauing Scotland on the Weſt, and bending toward Norway; ill aduiſed (but that neceſſitie vrged, and God had infatuated their counſels) to put their ſhaken and battered bottoms into thoſe blacke and dangerous Seas; neither was the Climate healthfull for the crazed bodies of the Spaniards, ouer-beaten and tyred with wants, being now entred the degree of Latitude 57. from whence the Lord Admirall returned, leauing ſome Scowts to deſcry their ſucceſſe.

The Spaniſh Armado flyeth.

(222) The Spaniards now cleared from thoſe their haunting ſpirits, conſulted moſt ſeriouſly what was to be done: the Popes credit was to be reſpected, who had predicted this voyage to fortunate ſucceſſe; the wrath of King Philip was to be feared, his great expences thus loſt; the Aduenturers loſers, if the voyage ſhould bee left; the glory of the Spaniards laid in the ſuds; the Inuincible Nauy in the ebbe of her fame: and England ſtill England, not lorded by the Spaniard, if they thus without further attempt ſhould returne into Spaine. But withall, fiue thouſand of their ſouldiers were ſlaine; multitudes of ſicke and maimed lay on their hands; twelue of their greateſt ſhips were ſunke, loſt, and taken; their Cables, Maſts and Saile, cut, rent, and broken, with the Engliſh ſhot; their anchors left, where the fired Hulkes forced them; their victuals failing, and freſh-water all ſpent; their enemies no leſſe fierce and vndauntable, then fortunate: and their long expected friend, the Duke of Parma though euer preparing, yet ſtill foreſtalled by the Dutch, moſt firme Allies vnto the Queene: theſe circumſtances wiſely ballanced, the voice went currant for ſpeeding into Spaine.

The Spaniſh conſultation.

(223) But knowing that Scotland (whoſe Religious King was faſt knit in affection, and blood vnto Queen Elizabeth) would would yeeld them no comfort, & hopeleſſe alſo that Norway would giue them any ſupply, they caſt all their Mules and Horſes ouer boord for ſparing of their freſh-water: then framing their courſe to ſayle about Cathnes and the coaſts of Ireland, ſo proceeded betweene the Orcades and Iles of Farr vnto the 61. degree Northward, whence the Duke of Medina, with his beſt ſtored ſhips tooke Weſtward ouer the maine Ocean towards Biſcay, and ſo arriued ſafely in Spaine; where for his Welcome, he was depoſed from all his authority, forbidden to come at the Court, and commanded to be priuate. Neither could hee thus giue ſatisfaction for his bad ſucceſſes, albeit he imputed it to the treachery of his Mariners, their ignorance, and ſmall experience of thoſe Northerne Seas, the want of ſuccours from the Prince of Parma, the tempeſts, ſhipwracks, and ill fortune, but not a word of the Iudgements of God, vpon this Gyantlike attempt to enſlaue all England to the Mountaines of Grenada, or to the Mines of Peru.

The Spaniards caſt their Horſes into the Sea.

(224) The reſidue of his ſhips, about forty in number, fell neerer with the coaſt of Ireland, intending for Cape Clare, where they well hoped to water, but the winds contrary, and tempeſts ſtorming vpon thoſe dangerous Seas, many of their ſhips periſhed vpon the ſhores of Ireland, and among other, a great Galliaſſe, wherein Michael de Oquendo was a Commander, and two other of Venice, both ſhips of great burthen, beſides thirtie eight more, together with moſt of the Spaniards contained within them. Thoſe that got cleare of the danger, put forth to Sea, whereof ſome with a ſtrong Weſt wind, were driuen into the channell of England, where part of them were taken by the Engliſh, others by men of Rochell in France, and ſome arriued at Newhauen in Normandy. In ſo much, that of one hundred thirty foure ſhips, which had ſet ſayle out of Lisbon, onely fifty three returned to Spaine: of the foure Galliaſſes of Naples, but one: of the foure Gallies of Portugall, but one: and of the ninety one Gallions and great Hulkes from diuers Prouinces, onely thirtie three returned, fifty eight being loſt: in briefe, there were miſſing of their whole Fleet, foureſcore and one veſſels, and of the thirty thouſand ſouldiers, thirteene thouſand, fiue hundred and odde. Of priſoners taken in England, Ireland, & the Low Countries were two thouſand & more. In England, Don Pedro de Valdez, Don Vaſquez de Sylua, and Don Alonzo de Sayes and others were kept for their ranſome: in Zeland, Don Diego de Piementell, and in Ireland, Don Alonzo de Lucon, Roderigo de Laſſe and others of great account: to conclude, there was no famous or worthy Family in all Spaine, which in this expedition loſt not a ſon, a brother, or a kinſman.

The ſumme of the Spaniards loſſe.

(225) Thus were theſe Sea-ſeruices effected: as for the Land, preparations were made thorowout the Kingdome, but the maine forces lying encamped at Tilbury vnder the command of the Earle of Leiceſter, thither her Maieſty in Perſon vpon the ninth of Auguſt repaired, full of Princely reſolution, and more then feminine courage, whoſe louely Preſence and Imperiall ſpeeches, as Shee paſſed like ſome Amazonian Empreſſe thorow all her Army, were ſo acceptable and gracious, that Her ſouldiers, full fraught with manly ſpirit, yet receiued an acceſſe of hardineſſe from ſo alacrious a Patterne in their Mayden Queene: and they perceiued ſo well the loue of their Prince, and Shee ſaw what it was to haue the loue of Her Subiects, that the harmony of both their affections was admirable, both of them profeſſing reſolution, and willing to ſacrifice their liues in that moſt rightfull quarrell. But the God of Hoſts hauing now preuented their forwardneſſe, without loſſe of Engliſh blood, eſt-ſoones the Campe was diſſolued: and not long after, Leiceſter ended his dayes, hauing beene a Peere of great eſtate, but lyable to the common deſtiny of moſt Great ones, whom all men magnifie in their life time, but few ſpeake well of after their death.

Earle of Leiceſters death.

(226) The Lord thus deliuered by the Arme of the Omnipotent, and the Bore put backe that ſought to lay Englands faire Vineyard waſte, Queene Elizabeth (who euer held ingratitude a Capitall ſinne, but eſpecially towards Her Almighty Protector) commanded ſolemne Thankes-giuing to be celebrated vnto the Lord God of Hoſts, at the Cathedrall Church of Saint Pauls in Her chiefe City of London, which accordingly was done vpon Sunday the eighth of September, where eleuen of the Spaniſh Enſignes (the once Badges of their brauery, but now of their vanity) were hung vpon the lower battlements of that Church, as Palmes of praiſe for Englands deliuerance; a ſhew no doubt more acceptable to God, then when their ſpred Colours did ſet out the pride of their Ships, threatning the blood of ſo many innocent and faithfull Chriſtians.

(227) The next day, the Faire being kept in Southwarke, theſe faire flagges were ſpred vpon London-Bridge, to the great ioy of the beholders, and eternall memory of Spaniſh purpoſes, as irreligious as vnproſperous. But the Solemne day aſſigned to be kept Holy thorowout the Land, was the nineteenth of Nouember, being Tueſday, which accordingly was then done, and would to God had ſo continued ſtill, being no leſſe for our deliuerance, then was that Purim for the Iewes, which they inſtituted to bee kept holy thorowout their generations.

Eſter. 9. 26.

(228) Queene Elizabeth therefore, to be Her ſelfe an example vnto others, vpon the Sunday following, being the foure and twentieth of Nouember, repayred from the Palace of White-Hall in Weſtminſter, thorow the ſtreets of London in great Eſtate: and came accompanied with her Nobility vnto the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, where diſmounting from her Chariot at the Weſt-doore, Shee humbled her ſelfe vpon her knees, and with great deuotion audibly praiſed God, acknowledging him her onely Defender, who had thus deliuered the Land from the rage of the enemy. And after the Sermon ended, wherin none other Argument was handled, but onely of prayſe and glory to be rendred vnto God; her Maieſty her ſelfe with moſt Princely and Chriſtian ſpeeches exhorted all the people to their due performances of thoſe religious ſeruices of thankfulneſſe vnto God, like vnto another Ioſuah, David, and Ioſias. The Zelanders alſo, to leaue a Memoriall of their no leſſe gratitude to God, then faithfulneſſe to the Queene, cauſed a new Coyne of ſiluer to bee ſtamped, hauing on the one ſide the Armes of their Countrey engrauen, with this Inſcription, Glory to God alone, and on the other ſide, the portracts of great Ships, vnder-ſtyled, The Spaniſh Fleet, and in the Circumference, It came, went, and was, Anno one thouſand fiue hundred eighty eight. Wherein they alluded to that quicke-worke of Cæſar, * Veni, vidi, vici, which wee haue ſeene alſo excellently deſcribed in deuice, where, on the one ſide, the Spaniſh Fleet had inſcribed veni, the Sunne (the eye of the whole world) vidi, and the Engliſh Nauy, vici. In other coynes alſo were ſtamped Ships fleeting, and ſinking, and in the reuerſe, Supplicants vpon their knees, with this Motto, Man propoſeth, God diſpoſeth, 1588. To the like effect alſo the Hollanders ſtamped the remembrance of this Armado in their monies, after the example of the Ancient, whoſe vſe was to inſcribe their victories vpon their Coynes, of which kinde were thoſe with Spaniſh Ships, hauing this Word, Impius fugit, nemine ſequente.

* I came, I ſaw, I conquered.

(229) Neither did the Dutch alone participate the triumph of this glorious ſucceſſe, but all other Nations alſo congratulated the ſame; which vniuerſall ioy being excellently expreſſed in this enſuing Ode, by a * Stranger of eminent Piety and Learning, and tranſlated into all the chiefe Languages of Chriſtendome; wee will here annex the ſame, as the Cloze and Epilogue of this Tragico-Comedy, to be perpetuated vnto all enſuing poſterities.

(230) The Thunderclappe of this Spaniſh Armado thus paſt, and the inuincible vanquiſhed, as the attempt and Iſſue was open to the eyes of the world, ſo the due conſideration thereof was rooted in all true Engliſh hearts; whereupon the Nobles and Comminalty being then aſſembled for Parliament, this courſe was at length thought fitteſt, that the proud Caſtilian ſhould be requited vpon his owne coaſts. And firſt it was determined to aide Don Antonio the expulſed King of Portugall, whoſe title was apparantly far more iuſt, then either Philips for England, or Stukeleys for Ireland; both which Kingdomes they had in hoſtile manner inuaded: and this the rather was reſolued on, for that the Spaniſh King was endeuouring to repaire his diſhonour by repairing his Fleet and Forces for a new expedition againſt England.

Conſultations for attempts on Spaine.

Don Antonio K. of Portugall flyeth to Queene Elizabeths protection.

Philip prepareth for a new expedition.

(231) This Don Antonio among other Competitors claimed the Crown of Portugall after the deceaſe of King Henry, as ſprung from King Emanuel by his ſonne Don Lewis the Infant; but alleadged by the Philippians to haue been his Baſtard. Againſt which accuſation Don Antonio had ſentence for his legitimation by the Biſhop of Angra, and euery way ſought to rub off that ſcandalous imputation. His conditions were ſuch as well befitted a Crowne, hee being a Prince of greater ſpirit then perſon, and yet of rare modeſty and humility, ſeaſoned with a diſpoſition very deuout and religious, whereby hee came to be in farre better fauour and eſteeme then Philip of Spaine; for which cauſe hee was firſt made Defender of the Realme by the Gouernours, and afterwards accepted King by the people, wherto he was in a manner inforced, ſeeing himſelfe enuironed with many drawn ſwords in midſt of a furious multitude.

Don Antonio his Title.

His conditions.

(232) But Philip as more ambitious, ſo more ſtrong in men and munition, made warre into Portugall, and by his Generall, Duke Alba, put this new King vnto flight; after which fortune, himſelfe enters Portugall, where hee proclaimed eight hundred thouſand Crownes to him that could bring him Don Antonio either aliue or dead. But ſuch was their loue vnto this vnfortunate Prince, that eight moneths he kept in Portugall diſguiſed, and had conuerſation and conference with many, yet was neuer betraied; but not able to hold vp his ſide, the Gouernours (as is the faſhion of the world) dayly falling to his ſtronger, after many conflicts, and much lamenting their miſerable eſtate, left the Spaniard (who then gaped for nothing but Kingdomes) to poſſeſſe the Gouernment of Portugall.

King Philip attempts the Crowne of Portugall.

Portugall poſſeſſed by the Spaniard.

(233) Antonio's Kingly ſtile thus ended, before it was throughly begun; Philip had ſubiections offered him anie, and in ſuch ſort, as ſome that ſeemed Competitors, yeelded him their rights, among whom Katherina Dutcheſſe of Braganſa was one: yea and Pope Gregorie himſelfe (with the Prior of Crata) who had hitherto ſided with Don Antonio, knowing it was ſureſt to hold with the ſtrongeſt, ſent Philip his Apoſtolicall allowance, the better to put on his New-gotten Crowne; exhorting him to thankfulneſſe, for theſe his proſperities; and mooving him earneſtly to make war againſt England, with proffers of aſſiſtance as we haue ſaid.

(234) Don Antonio thus driuen out of his Kingdome, for ſuccour repaired vnto the Court of France; where, of the Queen Mother, a pretended Competitor for the Portugall Crowne, hee was both fauoured and aided at Seas for the Iles of Terceres: but ſuch was his deſtiny in his Sea-fights alſo (the Perüan gold being no leſſe powerfull then the Spaniſh Cānons) that eight of the talleſt French Ships were loſt, and two thouſand men ſlaine; among whom was the Lord Philip Troßy their Generall, whoſe death was ſo taken, and the expedition ſo cenſured, as the Portugall Captaines were reputed for Cowards, impriſoned in France, and many of them charged with corruption and treaſon; ſo that all his hopes were now in the wane, and no further aſſiſtance could be expected of the French.

King Antonio ſeekes aide from France.

His loſſes at ſea

(235) The poore Prince thus deiected in France, knowing the vniuerſall report of Queen Elizabeths great fame, obtained leaue of her Maieſty for acceſſe vnto her ſacred Preſence, whoſe Court had euer been a famouſed Sanctuary to all oppreſſed Princes, or diſtreſſed Eſtates: where ſhewing his right to the Portugal Crown, and clearing the obiections touching his baſtardy (which imputation in ſundry languages he refuted in Print to the publike view of the world) receiued now comfort to be ſet in his Kingdome, England hauing ſo iuſt an occaſion to war againſt Spaine. Among whom once more hee aſſayed to try the fauour of Fortune; his Petition to the Queene being onely this, that She would but land him ſafe in his Country, and amongſt his owne People, of whoſe aſſured loue and readineſſe to receiue him as their King, and thenceforward to defend him and his iuſt Title, hee nothing doubted, ſo honeſt and reaſonable a ſuite could not but find fauour with ſo gracious a Queene: whereupon prouiſion being made for the Portugall voyage, hee embarked at Plimouth in April, whence ſixe of the Queens Ships, and twenty more of warre (beſides many other ordained for tranſportation) ſpred their Sailes vnder the conduct of the euer-feared Sir Francis Drake, and the moſt valorous Sir Iohn Norris Generall for the land ſeruice, with eleuen thouſand ſoldiers, and twenty fiue hundred Mariners. Theſe * landing in a Bay of Galicia, neere vnto the Groine, in their March were met and encountred within halfe a mile of the Towne, but their enemies were ſoone forced to retire vnto their Gates.

K. Antonio repaires for aid to Q. Elizabeth.

Succours are afforded him.

An. Dom. 1589. The Portugall voyage.

Ant. Winkfeild. * April. 20.

(236) The next day General Norris hauing viewed the aduantage, reſolued to attempt the place by a ſcalado, and to land ſome Artillery, to beat the Ships and Gallies which did play vpon their troopes, which was effectually performed; and the Gallies forced to abandon the Roade, the Baſe-towne was ſurprized, and in three ſeuerall places entred, where the Inhabitants with a great cry tooke into the high Towne, but ſome preuented, eſcaping the fury of the ſword, fledde to the Rockes, where they were found and ſlaine to the number of fiue hundred. Among theſe ſo hid, Don Iuan de Luna, a man of great command, was one, who the next morning came forth, and yeelded himſelfe to the Generals deuotion. Iuan de Vera, a Commiſſary of victuals was likewiſe taken, who confeſſed that there was in the Towne three hundred thouſand Ducats of ſiluer, and order giuen for the baking of three hundred thouſand of Bisket, that the Towne was ſtored with two thouſand Pipes of wine, a thouſand Iars of Oyle, three thouſand Kintals of Beefe, a great quantity of Beanes, Peaſe, Wheat and Fiſh, & of Match and Harqueboizes three Barkes were brought thither not long before. All which (hee confeſſed) were for a new voyage againſt England. And indeed ſuch ſtore of wines was there found, as the Engliſh Souldiers vſing little moderation in drinking, did not onely lay themſelues open to danger from the vpper Towne, but by diſtemperature ſo inflamed and infected their blood, that it cauſed a great mortality and infection in the whole Army.

Infection through intemperate drinking of wine.

(237) The Baſe-Towne thus gotten, a ſudden reſcue of two thouſand men ſo reſolutely came to the very Gates, as though no contrary power could poſſibly keepe them from entrance, but in the firſt brunt of reſiſtance, they were content to make their heeles the ſafeguardians of their heads, of whom yet many were cut ſhort by the Engliſh purſuers. With the like feare the Ships in the Roade were fraught, whoſe Souldiers ouercharging the great Ordnance of a great Gallion, abandoned her boord, and ſet her on fire, which for the ſpace of two dayes burned in moſt terrible wiſe, ſo that of fifty great Peeces, but ſixteene were found whole, the reſt broken and melted, and ſo brought away by the Engliſh; but the higher towne ſtrong both by ſituation and ſufficiency for reſiſtance, reſolutely held out, onely intreated by Parley to haue faire Wars. And being built for the moſt part on a hard rocke, one place was found mineable, where the Generall the fourth day of this ſiege ſet men on worke, who bedded their powder ſomwhat too ſhort of the wall, whereby that deſigne tooke not the ſuppoſed effect. But this error reduced, another as great was committed; for the Miners againe ſet on worke, came right vnder the Wall, but ſomwhat wide of a great Tower thereupon built, ſo that when the blaſt of powder brake forth, it ouerthrew but a part of the ſame, and left the other ſtanding tottering and ſhaken, which being not regarded, in the heat of aſſault fell ſuddenly vpon the Engliſh, and ſlew Captaine Sydenham with thirty Souldiers beſides, to the great aſtoniſhment of the reſt there imployed, not knowing the cauſe whereof it came, but rather ſuſpecting it a Stratagem of the Towne; and the reſt of the rubbiſh lay ſo looſe vnder foot, that the Aſſaulters could haue no ſure ſtanding to make their fight.

The Groine ſurprized.

The enemy put to flight.

(238) Whiles

(238) Whiles theſe things were in doing, the Generall had certaine notice that the Conde de Andrada had aſſembled an Army of eight thouſand ſtrong, which was but the beginning of another more ſtrong, leuyed vnder the Conde de Altemira; the former, not paſſing ſixe miles off, and both of them intending the reſcue of the Groine: To preuent which, Sir Iohn Norris with nine Regiments * met them, and preſently fell to a hot skirmiſh, whoſe brunt the enemy not able to endure, tooke ouer a Bridge, built vpon a Creeke of the Sea, at the further foote whereof their Campe lay very ſtrongly entrenched. Sir Edward Norris, Colonell Sidney, the Captaines Hinder, Fulford, & Barton entred the Bridge, whoſe further end was barricadoed with Barrels, where comming to puſh of pike and ſword, Sir Edward was grieuouſly hurt in the head, Captaine Hinder receiued fiue wounds in the head and face by the Sword; Captaine Fulford hurt in the left arme with a ſhot, and Captaine Barton hurt in the eye. Notwithſtanding, the Generall ſo ſeconded the encounter, as the Guard was ouerthrowne, and the whole Army put into rowt, of whom our men had the Chaſe fully three miles in foure ſundry wayes. What the ſlaughter was, is vncertaine, but ſuppoſed to be great; beſides others that were found hid in Vineyards and hedges, and two hundred put to ſword that had taken into a Cloiſter. In this ſeruice the Kings Standard was taken, ſome plate and rich apparell found in their Campe, and the Countrey for three miles compaſſe ſet on flaming fire; the Generall making his retreat with the Kings Colours and Armes diſplayed before him, to the great honour of the Engliſh.

The enemy encountred.

The Engliſh are Victors.

(239) Thus returning vnto the Groyne, and wanting Cannons to batter the walles, the Engliſh fired the Baſe-Town, embarked from thence, and put againe to Sea. But the winds being contrary, many aſſaies were made, before the Fleete could recouer the Burlings, in which paſſage Robert Earle of Eſſex, with Mr. Walter Deuereux his brother, accompanied with others, * came to the Fleete; which Earle hauing put himſelfe into the Iourney againſt the opinion of the world, or well-liking of the Queene, ſeemed vnto the Sager ſort to hazard his fortunes; but other more ſtirring ſpirits, held it the great aduancement of his reputation; whereof I thinke I may ſay, as Tacitus ſaid of Veſpaſians employment in Britaine, That there was laid the firſt foundation of his future eſteeme.

(240) The Fleete thus encreaſed, they landed in Portugall, euen vnder ſhot of the Caſtle of Peniche, where the Sea growing high, many were in perill of drowning; for moſt of them waded to the waſte for the Shore. Of this Towne and Peece, Conde de Fuentes had the command; who with fiue Companies of Spaniards ſallied out againſt the Engliſh, and made their approach cloſe to the Sea-ſide; whereupon the Earle of Eſſex, with Sr. Roger Williams diuided their men into two Troupes; the one keeping the Sands along the Shore, and the other ouer the Sand-hills made towards the In-land. Which the enemy ſeeing, haſted to the encounter, and came vnto fight, euen within puſh of Pike; but were ſo entertained, as they had no great liking; but preſently turned their backs, and fled further then the Engliſh had reaſon to follow. The Towne they left vndefended, ſo that it was entred without any reſiſtance, and the Caſtle ſummoned the ſame night; the Captaine whereof was Antonio de Aurid, a Portugall, who demanding, and being ſatisfied, that Don Antonio was preſent, gaue vp the Peece, with the munition therein. Vnto this place ſome Fryers and other poore of the Countrey, came to welcome their King, promiſing him (in the name of the reſt) a ſufficient ſupply both of horſe and foot, which notwithſtanding was neuer performed.

Peniche in Portugall taken.

(241) Here it was thought fit that the wounded and ſicke ſhould remaine, with ſufficient prouiſion, and ſeuen companies of foote to guard the Ships and Caſtle; and the maine Army to march ouer land vnto Lisbon, the Metropolitane of Portugall, accounted the ſtrongeſt Fort in the World, and whoſoeuer held that, might (in their eſteeme) make head againſt the mightieſt Monarch in the Earth; whither likewiſe Sir Francis Drake (Generall of the Sea-ſeruice) promiſed to come, if the iniury of weather did not hinder him. The March vnder-taken, Tarres Vedras made ſome ſhew of reſiſtance, but preſently vpon the approch of the Engliſh, that Caſtle was abandoned, and left to the poſſeſſion of Don Antonio; whoſe hopes hereupon began to enlarge, thinking the whole would ſtand for his claime; but therein was not a little deceiued; for victuals growing ſcarce in the the Army, the Countrey did not ſupply them according to expectation, neither came in any of ſtrength. Notwithſtanding the Engliſh Army from Vedras marched to San Sebaſtian, thence to Lores, and lodged the fift day at Aluelana, three miles from Lisbon, where many of their Souldiers periſhed by drinking in two places of poyſoned ſtanding waters, as alſo in eating of honey, purpoſely left in the houſes, and ſpiced with poyſon, as it was thought.

The Engliſh approch Lisbon.

(242) The fiue and twentieth of May, the Engliſh Army came vnto Lisbon, whoſe Suburbes were found abandoned, houſes of prouiſion for corne and victuals fired, and none left to defend, but a ſort of old folkes and beggers, crying in the ſtreetes, Viua el Rey Don Antonio; and about midnight they within the Towne ſet fire on their houſes that ſtood within vpon the wall. The Engliſh wearied with the ſixe daies march, want of victuall, the laſt nights watch, and many of them weake, were deſirous of reſt; wherof the enemy hauing aduertiſement, in the dead of the night ſallied out of the Towne; and made their aſſault in three ſeuerall ſtreets, but chiefly vpon Colonell Brets Quarters, who being at reſt (as moſt of the Army were) with what haſte was poſſible, put himſelfe, and his in Armes, and ſo throughly made head, that he was ſlaine in the place; Captaine Carre with the like reſiſtance and valour ended his life; Captaine Carſey wounded to Death; Captaine Caue hurt, but not mortally. The others found not their attempts ſo eaſie, but were put to a ſudden and foule retreat; inſomuch as the Earle of Eſſex (full of high ſpirit, and hot youthly blood) had them in chaſe to the very gates of the high towne, and (as it was truly reported) the enemies loſſe did triple the Engliſh, aſwell in quantity, as in men of quality.

Drake ſurprizeth Caſcais.

(243) Meane-while Generall Drake with his whole Fleete was come to Caſcais, and poſſeſſed the towne without any reſiſtance, for the inhabitants at the diſcouery of his Nauie, fled with bagge and baggage into the mountaines, which the Generall perceiuing, ſent vnto them a Portugall Pilote, to offer them all peaceable kindneſſe, ſo as they would accept of their rightfull King, and miniſter neceſſaries to the Army which hee had brought. Which offer they ioyfully imbraced, and preſently ſent two chiefe men of the Towne, to ſignifie their loyalty to Don Antonio, and their honeſt affection to his Army: whereupon Sir Francis immediately landed his Companies, but not without perill of the Caſtle, which being guarded by the Spaniards, held out againſt him for their King.

(244) At Lisbon the Portugals had promiſed to ayde Antonio, with three thouſand horſe, beſides other ſupplies from the Duke of Braganſa, Don Francisco de Toledo, and others, at a day prefixed, and now altogether paſt, by reaſon (as it ſeemeth) that the Spaniards hauing chiefe command in all places, they were vnable by any meanes to make head. Whereupon the vnfortunate Antonio ſeeing the time expired, and but forty horſe come, nor of foote ſufficient to furniſh two Enſignes, grew almoſt hopeleſſe, yet aſſaied he to perſwade a ſtay before Lisbon for nine dayes more: but the Towne being ſtrong, and the Engliſh declining (for there was the firſt apparent ſhew of ſickneſſe among them) the Portugals backward, and of baſe reſolutions, ready to obey any, ſo themſelues may be rich: and the Generall hauing already done more then was promiſed, leſt they ſhould hazard the honour which hitherto had beene got, denied his requeſt, and gaue preſent order to returne to Caſcais, himſelfe, the Earle of Eſſex, and Sir Roger Williams remaining with the ſtand, that was made in the high ſtreete, till the whole Army was drawne into the field: at which time, the King (euen herein of kingly diſpoſition towards his Natiues) made requeſt to ſaue the ſuburbes from ſpoile; which if the Engliſh had ranſacked, they had been the richeſt Army that euer returned to England. But now ready to depart Lisbon, the noble Eſſex in the courage of his Martiall blood, ranne his ſpeare and brake it againſt the Gates of that City: demanding alowd, if any Spaniard mewed therein, durſt aduenture forth in fauour of his Miſtreſſe to breake a ſtaffe with him. But thoſe Gallants thought it ſafer to court their Ladies with amorous diſcourſes, then to haue their loues written on their breſts with the point of his Engliſh Speare.

Don Antonio his Princely compaſſion.

(245) Being now come to Caſcais, intelligence was brought by a Fryer, that the enemy was marched vnto Saint Iulian with a ſtrong power to encounter the Engliſh, vnto whoſe Generall, the Generall Norris ſent a Trumpet, promiſing to meete him the next morning, if he durſt abide his comming, and withall gaue gaue him the lye: the Earle of Eſſex alſo ſent him a particular Cartell, offering himſelfe againſt any of theirs, if they had any of his quality; or elſe ſixe, eight or tenne, to try ſingle combate: whereat the Spaniards combe was ſo cut, as in the night, before battell, in great feare and perturbation he diſlodged, and returned to Lisbon, not anſwering the Challenge, but threatning to hang the Meſſenger, who followed him euen to the very Gate. Then was the Caſtle of Caſcais rendred vpon condition, that the men of Armes ſhould depart with bagge and baggage; which Peece in part, by the Order of the Generall, was blowne vp by myne. During which time, threeſcore Hulkes laden with Corne, Maſts, Cables, Copper, and Waxe, being the Spaniſh Kings prouiſion, were taken going to Lisbon.

The Caſtle of Caſcais rendred.

Sixtie Spaniſh Hulkes taken.

(246) The Engliſh hauing thus farre proceeded, put againe to Sea, when, vnlooked for, & in a great calme, nine Gallies fell in the winde of their Fleete, and ſo plaide vpon a ſtraggling Barke of Plymouth, that Captaine Caluerly, his Lieutenant, the Maſter, and ſome of the Mariners, abandoning the veſſell, betooke them to their Boates, whereof one, (in which the Captaine and Maſter were) was ouerrunne by the Gallies, and they both drowned. Two other Hulkes alſo ſtraggling from the Fleet, were ſet vpon by the Spaniards; in one of which, Captaine Minſhaw fought to the laſt, and very valiantly, after his ſhip was on fire; but whether fired by himſelfe or the enemy, could not be iudged; the calme being ſo ſtill, as no ſuccour could be ſent from the Fleete, to their great griefe.

(247) Thus continuing ſeuenteene dayes on boord, many of the dead ſouldiers were caſt into the Sea; and the whole now conſiſted of two thouſand men, who comming to Vigo, found euery ſtreete fenced with a ſtrong Barricadoe, and but only one man in the Towne, the Inhabitants making toward Bayon as faſt as they could driue; then was both the Towne and all the Countrey for ſeuen miles compaſſe ſet on a flame. Which ſeruice thus performed, S^r. Francis Drake with the Queenes Ships ſafely * arriued at Plymouth, and vpon the ſecond of Iuly following, arriued Sir Iohn Norris, hauing both of them performed the parts of worthy Generals.

* Iune 21.

(248) Whileſt theſe Realmes were at variance each againſt others, the French were not quiet among themſelues, the King ſomewhat voluptuous, but exceſſiuely prodigall towards his fauourites, the Nobility ambitious, miſtruſtfull, and diſloyall, the Clergy turbulent, and vndutifull; bending all their force and thoughts againſt the Plantation of the Truth. To vnite friendſhip therefore, ſome league had beene made, for confirmation whereof, the three Eſtates were aſſembled at Bloys. For the Clergy appeared one hundred thirty foure Deputies, among whom were foure Arch-biſhops, one and twenty Biſhops, and two Generals of Orders: for the Nobilitie came one hundred and foureſcore Gentlemen, and for the third Eſtate an hundred fourſcore and eleuen Deputies, all of them Lawyers and Merchants. Vpon the firſt ſitting, and before theſe beſt wits of France, King * Henry made a ſolemne Oration to perſwade vnion, full of liuely affection, true magnanimity, and pregnant reaſons, deliuered with ſuch an admirable eloquence and grace, as it rauiſhed the eares of all preſent, beſides the opening of the propoſitions; the which, Mantelon, the Keeper of the Seale, for him further proſecuted: after him, Reynauld de Beaulme, Archbiſhop of Bourges, Patriarke and Primate of Aquitain, ſpake in the ſame argument: and laſtly, Michell Marteau, Prouoſt and Prefident for the third Eſtate, confirmed, and conſented to all that had beene ſaid. Whereupon an Oath of vnion was taken, to binde the King, them, and all their Poſterities, the fundamentall Lawes and Liberties of France onely reſerued.

An Oath of Vnion in France.

(249) This notwithſtanding, the Leaguers, to hit the marke whereat they aymed, daily diuulged and buzzed the French Kings diſgraces, & all to inſtall the Guize in his Throne; the Papiſts wrongs were grieuouſly expoſtulated, their Churches burnt, and Altars profaned, the People oppreſſed with impoſitions and Subſidies; Places of iudgement ſet to ſale, and ſpirituall Benefices to him that would giue moſt: the Officers at Court, they alleaged, were managed by men of meane rank; the Noblemens ſeruices neglected, and vnrewarded. All theſe, and more, were complained of, and all to make the King baſe in the Peoples eye, the Guize himſelfe the while temporizing with both, as diſſwading the King to ſubiect his authority vnto their complaints, and at the ſame preſent perſwading the other, to be vehement in their purſuits.

The Guizians practices.

An. Dom. 1588. Nouem. 4.

(250) Among their other practices, one was againſt the King of Nauarre; whom the Clergy condemned for an Heretike, the chiefe (as they termed him) of the relapſe; excommunicated and depriued him of the Gouernment of Guienne, and of all other dignities, as being vnworthy of ſucceſſions of Crownes or Realmes. But Henry, with Feſtus thought it vnreaſonable, to condemne this Prince without hearing, and therefore deſired to haue him againe ſummoned, and againe to be ſworne to the Vnion.

Acts 25.

(251) To this motion was anſwered, That the Cardinall of Bourbon his vncle had once obtained abſolution for him; that the Queene Mother had many times aſſayed to winne him, many learned Doctors had beene ſent to reclaime him: but all in vaine. For, from the Cradle (ſaid they) hee hath beene brought vp in this new Hereſie, hath beene condemned by the Councell of Trent, receiued againe into grace by the Conſiſtory, is againe falne into the error which hee abiured, and is now an Heretike, relapſed, vnworthy of obedience, vnworthy of reſpect, and vnworthy to be prayed for: for the holy See of Rome hath declared him a Schiſmatike, excommunicated him as incapable of ſucceſſion, and therefore muſt the Eſtates of France ratifie the Popes ſentence; and King Henry muſt thereunto ſubſcribe, if not, the Duke of Guize, who was Maſter of the Caſtle, and carried the keyes at his owne girdle, would diſſolue the Aſſembly, and lay all the blame vpon his Maieſty.

(252) Thus then (by the purpoſe of man) the firſt Prince of the blood, and the onely remainder, after ſo many Siſters and Couſins of Anjou, Alencon, Eureux, Berry, Bourgoyne, Angoleſme, and Orleans, and which onely ſucceeded that of Valois, was now depriued of the ſucceſſion which Nature gaue him, without calling, or hearing of his iuſtifications.

Henry King of Nauarre pronounced incapable of the Crowne of France.

(253) To further this Guizian enterprize, his followers buzd into the heads of the multitude, that it was the Kings Climacterical yeere, and ſo many preſumptions were obſerued, as it was told the King in plaine termes, that the Duke of Guize would ſurprize him. Whereupon, hauing remained long in ſuſpence, betwixt the rigour of reuenge, and the mildneſſe of his owne diſpoſition; at laſt, by the lightening, ſuppoſing a thunderclap would follow, he ſought timely to preuent the danger, by taking away his life, that intended the blow. Which was not ſo ſecretly carryed, but that the deſigne was diſcouered, and a ſcrowle laid vnder Guize his Napkin as he ſate at dinner, wherein it was written, that his life was in danger: but hee, as one confident in his owne power, wrote in the ſame ſcrowle theſe words, They dare not; and threw it from him vnder the Table. Other aduertiſements he had, (if we may beleeue the additions of Serres) from Rome, Spaine, Lorraine, and Sauoy, that a bloody Cataſtrophe ſhould diſſolue this Aſſembly, their Almanackes had obſerued it, and it was generally predicted for Saint Thomas day.

(254) But the Duke bearing himſelfe bold vpon his owne greatneſſe, neglected all motiues, and very preſumptuouſly ſpake to the King, complaining that the affaires of France inclined from bad vnto worſe, vncurable, and almoſt growne deſperate, wherefore, the charge he had receiued, he would againe giue vp, and retire into the Countrey, leſt other mens ſinnes ſhould be imputed his.

(255) The King, who had reſolued on his death, gaue him good words, with promiſe of amendment what in him lay, and held him with familiar diſcourſes, and fauourable countenance, vntill a fit time ſhould be offered; which was the three and twentieth of December, when the Lords ſitting in Councell, and entring conſultation, the Guize was called for vnto the King, who as he lifted vp the Tapeſtry into his Cabinet, was charged vpon by the Guard, and with their Swords and Partizans preſently ſlaine; the King auouching, that thence-forth he would rule alone. And not long after, the Cardinall of Guize, brother to the Duke, dranke of the ſame Cup, at the commandement of the King.

Iohn Serres.

(256) This death of the Guize and Cardinall, cauſed the King to be exceedingly hated of the Papals, whoſe Preachers branded his reproches in their Pulpits, incenſing the People to open rebellion, and as Furies of Hell, heaped an Iliade of curſes vpon the heads of the Executioners. In Paris the Kings furniture, and in the Louure his Pictures were broken, his Armes beaten downe, his Images dragged thorow the ſtreetes, his great Seale defaced, and his Royall name blurred with many opprobrious termes. Yea, and the Colledge of Sorbon as forward as any, concluded by a publike * Act, That the people of France were free from the Oath of of Obedience and Fealty, which they ſtood ingaged in vnto Henry of Valois, that lawfully, and with a good conſcience they might arme themſelues againſt him, receiue his reuenewes, and imploy it in their warres for his ouerthrow.

The praiſes attributed to the Guiſe.

(257) Contrariwiſe the Duke of Guize was extolled to Heauen, Orations made of his commendable exploits in Hungary againſt the Turkes, at Iarnac againſt the Proteſtants, at Poitiers, at Montcontour, at Vimorry, and at other places; in a word, ſuch were the inteſtine troubles of France, as the King ſent for Henry King of Nauarre, to helpe quench the flames of ciuill ſedition, which were mounted ſo high, as that the Leaguers preuailed againſt the Lords of Parliament, prophaned Churches, violated Virgins, and defiled their Chriſtian profeſſion with ſtreames of blood. And to fill vp the meaſure of their impious iniquity, a Iacobin Fryer, by name Iames Clement, when the King had beſieged Paris, (the head Citie of this rebellion) made vowes to kill the Tyrant (as he tearmed him) to free that holy Citie from Senacheribs ſiege; with which reſolution hee went to Doctor Bourgoine, Pryor of his Couent, and imparted this damnable proiect to him, to Father Commolet, to other Ieſuites, and to the heads of the League, all of them incouraging him to this diuelliſh deſigne, with promiſe of Abbeyes and Biſhopricks, if he eſcaped, and if he dyed in the action, to bee made a Martyr, and haue place in Heauen aboue the Apoſtles.

A Iacobine Fryer vndertaketh to kill the King.

An. Dom. 1589.

(258) Thus furniſhed with bleſſings for this curſed act, vpon the firſt of Auguſt the Monke went to Paris, & had priuate acceſſe to the King to deliuer a Letter, pretending ſome matter of importance; but as the King read it, the Diabolicall Inſtrument with a Knife from his ſleeue, wounded him in the bottome of his belly, and there left the knife, which the King drew forth, and with the ſame ſtrucke this Iacobine aboue the eye: their ſtrugling being heard, many haſtily came in, who ſeeing the King wounded, and all in goare blood, in their rage ſtabbed the Monſter to death, & not many dayes after, King Henry dyed of the wound.

(259) Whereupon Charles Cardinall of Bourbon, a younger brother to Anthony King of Nauarre, and vncle vnto Henry then the preſent King, was proclaimed Lieutenant Gouernour, yea, and gold and ſiluer coyned with his picture and ſtile of Charles the tenth, King of France. Howbeit, Henry King of Nauarre was proclaimed of the Army, whoſe right was before that Papall Prelates, and whom the laſt Henry by his laſt will ordained to be his Succeſſor. Notwithſtanding onely in reſpect of his Religion, being a profeſſed Proteſtant, the Leaguers made ſuch head againſt him, that hee was enforced to ſue vnto that Generall Sanctuary of Princes, Queene Elizabeth, for her ayde, who euer fauouring the progreſſe of the Goſpell, and knowing Nauarres claime to be aboue all other (of that Nation) for the French Crowne, and that the Spaniard was ſetting foot into France: firſt ſent him twenty thouſand pound ſterling, with Powder, Munition for warre, and certaine Ships alſo to ſerue at his command; and cauſing a generall muſter to be taken in moſt of the Shires in England, ſent foure thouſand Souldiers furniſhed, from euery of them into France; to which ſeruice the Citizens of London ſet forth a thouſand very well appointed, and ſeruiceable men: the Generall of all which Forces, was the noble Peregrine Bartie Lord Willoughby: whoſe want ſhee againe ſupplyed with three thouſand foote, which were ſent into Britaine, vnder the conduction of Sir Iohn Norris, that ſonne of Mars: theſe ioyning with the Prince Dombes, Lord Generall of that Prouince, performed many worthy exploits for the French King.

(260) But Parma being entred France, and the * Pope with his Cardinals fulminating his Excommunication againſt Henry, and his adherents: Queene Elizabeth (who neuer was daunted with ſuch flaſhes) ſent into France Robert Earle of Eſſex, for her Lieutenant Generall ouer foure thouſand Footmen, and two hundred Horſe, (beſides many Pyoners) all of them to bandy for the King againſt his enemies the Leaguers. The Earle, though young, yet full of valour, was followed with many voluntary Gentlemen, whoſe countenances well ſhewed the courage of their hearts: Theſe landing in Normandy, laid ſiege vnto the ſtrong Roan, in aſſault whereof his brother Walter Deuereux was ſlaine with a ſmall ſhot, to the exceſſiue griefe of the Earle, and others, being a Gentleman trayned vp, both by Academicall and Marſhall education, vnto very great hopes and expectation.

at ſtake for him that threw moſt, thought it good policy (though prooued to him in the end diſaſterous and fatall) to temporize with the predominating faction; & therefore leauing the Religion wherein he had been bred, fell to that of Rome, which euer till then he had reſiſted, and after great ſuite made to the Pope, was laſtly abſolued by the Holy Father, who heaped whole ſtreames of bleſſings vpon his ſacred head, himſelfe ſwearing to defend the Romiſh faith againſt all impugners: ſo that now all ſides ſatisfied, without contradiction; Henry of Nauarre was crowned King of France. Onely the Spaniards were vnwilling to leaue that faire Countrey, fortified in Britaine vpon the Riuer, ouer againſt Breſt; whence after much ſlaughter, Generall Norris forced them, though with the loſſe of ſome Engliſh, and life of Captaine Furbiſher, Commander of the Fleet.

An. Dom. 1593. Iuly 25.

(262) The Leaguers not liking Nauarres aduancement, miſtruſting that his conuerſion was fained, and temporary, as being but a ſtep, the eaſier to mount the Royall Throne: by Treaſon laid wait for his life, and croſt what they could his countenance at Rome; whileſt the Spaniards imployed all their wits for the woorrying of France, and ſo farre perſiſted in their deſignes, as King Henry by Proclamation denounced warre againſt Spain, & Philip in like manner proclaimes warre againſt France; in which ſtate they ſtood, during the life of Erneſtus Archduke of Auſtria, brother in Law and Nephew vnto King Philip, whoſe Gouernor he then was in the Low-Countries.

Warres proclaimed betwixt France and Spaine.

(263) After whom ſucceeded his brother Albertus the Military Cardinall, and Arch-Duke of Auſtria, who no ſooner was made Gouernour in place of his Brother, but that hee prepared againſt the French and Vnited Eſtates: and to make his aſſayes, hee firſt began with Callis, a thing long before proiected by others in his place; that Towne being Seaport of great importance, as the Engliſh found it whileſt it was theirs, and the loſſe thereof great, as Queene Mary and her wiſe Statiſts both tooke it, and felt it.

Callis ſurprized.

(264) At this time the Garriſon was ſmall, and the Gouernour negligent, vndiſcreet, and vnfortunate, though hauing notice from Netherland, that the Spaniard meant her ſiege; ſo that Richbanke left vnmanned, and in great ruine, was entred vpon by the Cardinall, and ſuch as reſiſted, driuen into the Towne; where, with the Inhabitants he grew to a compoſition for the ſurrender, Vyſdoſſein the Gouernour neuer enterpoſing therein.

An. Dom. 1596.

(265) Callis thus turning Spaniſh, and the Spaniards ſtill intending for England, Elizabeth ſollicited the French King, and proffered her ayde for recouery of that Piece; but hee impoueriſhed by warre, ſought to regaine his loſſes rather by ſome faire conditions of peace, then to depend vpon the dependancies and hazard of Armies: at which reſolution, our Noble Senobia was nothing well pleaſed, and therefore to preuent the practices of Spaine, began to make good againſt them, and prepared another expedition to Sea. But dealing more Prince-like then Philip had done by her (who made faireſt pretence of peace, when he was hoteſt in preparing warre) ſhee cauſed to be publiſhed and Printed a Declaration of the iuſt cauſes mooving her to ſet forth her Nauy, for the defence of her Realme, the Tenour whereof we thinke not vnfit to be here inſerted.

and her People, and Countries, without any iuſt cauſe firſt giuen on her Maieſties part: Therefore we the ſaid Earle, & Lord Admirall, doe aſcertaine all perſons, that wee are moſt ſtraitly commanded by Her Excellent Maieſty, to forbeare from offending in this our voyage, of any manner of Perſons of what Nation ſoeuer, except the ſaid Kings Naturall Subiects, or ſuch other borne Strangers, as ſhall giue to the ſaid King manifeſt ayde with Men, Ships, Artillery, Victuall, and other warlike prouiſions for inuaſion of her Maieſty. Which her Maieſties commandement wee meane dutifully to obſerue, and doe therefore giue ſtrait charge to all perſons, that ſhall ſerue in this Nauy vnderneath vs, vpon paine of extreme puniſhment, to obſerue the ſame; yet to auoide all occaſions that may breed queſtion, who they are, being not the King of Spaines Subiects, that ſhall be charged by vs, to bee manifeſt ayders for the furniſhing and ſtrengthning of the ſaid Kings Forces, prouided either by Land or Sea, to attempt any inuaſion of her Maieſties Countries: Wee doe for the liquidation of this doubt, earneſtly in Gods name, require and charge all perſons, that are not the ſaid Kings naturall Subiects, and yet that haue giuen him ayde with their Ships, victuall and munition as is aboueſaid, to withdraw all their ſaid ſhips prepared for the warre, and all their prouiſions of hoſtilitie out of any Hauens of Spaine or Portugall, or from the company and ſeruice of the Kings Ships againſt our Nauy; and therewith to returne either to their owne Countries, or if they ſhall like to come to our Nauy, to whom, in the reuerend name of our Soueraigne Lady the Queenes Maieſty, wee doe promiſe all Security, both for their perſons and goods, to bee vſed and defended as friends, and to ſuffer all their Ships and prouiſions, that were taken by the King of Spaine, or intended for his ſeruice, or that ſhall bee by the Owners withdrawne from his aide, to remaine in their free diſpoſitions, ſo as the ſame be vſed in all ſorts as friends, and not as enemies to the Queenes Maieſty, and to vs her Generals: and if any ſhall, vpon knowledge of this her Maieſties moſt honourable Order, and of our promiſe (to obſerue the ſame as fauourably as wee may) willingly and manifeſtly refuſe to accept this our offer, and ſhall not endeauour themſelues to performe this reaſonable requeſt, tending to their good and liberty; we ſhall then be iuſtly mooued, as by the law of Armes we may, to take and vſe all ſuch ſo refuſing this our offer, as manifeſt ayders of the King of Spaine, with forces to inuade Her Maieſties Dominions, and ſo manifeſt enemies: and in ſuch caſe of that refuſall, if any harme ſhall happen by any attempt againſt their Perſons, Ships and goods, by any our Nauy, for the ayding of the ſaid King, there ſhall be no iuſt cauſe for them hereafter to complaine, or to procure their Naturall Princes and Lords to ſollicite reſtitutions or amends for the ſame. And for the more notification hereof, we haue thought good to haue the Originall hereof to bee ſigned with our hands, and with our Seales, to bee ſent by any that will require to reade or ſee the ſame: And likewiſe we haue put the ſame in Print, in French, Italian, Dutch and Spaniſh, and haue alſo cauſed the ſame to be diſtributed into as many Ports of Spaine and Portugall as conueniently might be, for the better knowledge to be had in the ſaid Ports, as alſo in all other Ports vnder his ſubiection.

2 Kings 19. 15.

A Prayer made by Queene Elizabeth for the proſpering of Her Nauy.

Moſt Omnipotent Maker, and Guider of the Worlds Maſſe, that onely ſearcheſt and fadomeſt the bottome of our hearts conceits, and in them ſeeſt the true Originals of all our actions intended: Thou that by thy foreſight doeſt truly diſcerne, how no malice of reuenge, nor quittance of iniury, nor deſire of bloodſhed, nor greedineſſe of lucre, hath bred the reſolution of our now-ſet out Army, but a heedfull care and wary watch, that no neglect of foes, nor ouer-ſurety of Haue, might breed either danger to Vs, or glory to them: theſe being the grounds wherewith thou doeſt inſpire the minde; we humbly beſeech thee with bended knees, proſper the worke, and with beſt fore-winds guide the iourney, ſpeed the victory, and make the returne the aduancement of thy glory, the triumph of their fame, and ſurety to the Realme, with the leaſt loſſe of the Engliſh blood. To theſe deuout Petitions, Lord giue thou thy bleſſed grant.

The Vice-Admirall was the Lord Thomas Howard, ſhipped in the Miranore; and the Rere-Admirall, Sir Walter Rawleigh, in the Warre-Spight; and for the States was Admirall, Iohn Van Duueuuoord, who ſerued in the Neptune, a Ship of foure hundred Tunnes, and accordingly the whole Fleete was diuided into fiue ſquadrons, with a commandement that euery ſquadron ſhould attend his Admirall, and euery one of theſe had his Vice-Admirall aſſigned. Of the firſt, was Sir Robert Southwell in the Lyon; of the ſecond, Sir Francis Vere, in the Rainebow; the third, Sir Robert Dudley, attending the Lord Thomas Howard, in the Non-Pareile; the fourth, Robert Croſſe, following Sir Walter Rawleigh in the Swift-ſure: and the laſt, was Iohn Gerbrantſon, Vice-Admirall of the Hollanders.

Officers for Land ſeruices.

(269) For the Land-ſeruice beſides the Generals, were Sir Francis Vere, Lord Marſhall: Sir Iohn Wingfield Camp-Maſter Generall: Sir Coniers Clifford, Sergeant Major, Sir George Carew, Maſter of the Ordnance: Iohn Bucke Prouoſt Marſhall: Oliuer Lambert Quarter-Maſter, and Roger Aſtley, Secretary. The Colonels of the Army were the Earle of Suſſex, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, Sir Thomas Gerrat, Sir Richard Winkfield, and Sir Edward Winkfield; of the Voluntaries, and for the Dutch, was the Count Lodowicke, in all about ten thouſand men. The priuate Councell for this expedition being ſelected, certaine inſtructions were ſent ſealed to euery Ship, with a commandement to the Captaine, not to breake them open, till ſuch time as they came to the South-Cape, vnleſſe they happened to bee ſeuered from the Fleet by ſtorme or miſchance; but if taken by an enemy, then to caſt them ouerboord.

The voyage to Cadiz.

(270) Thus ready for Seas, vpon the firſt of Iune a warning Peece being ſhot off, all weyed Anchors, and with a gallant ſhew, and full ſayles followed the Lord Admirall; but the wind ſcanting before they paſt Cornwall, they were enforced backe into the Sound, where ſtaying two dayes, vpon the third, the winde came about, and with a proſperous Gale brought them to Cape Saint Vincent, where an Iriſh Barke was met with from Cadiz, which ſignified the ſtrength of the Towne, and the ſhipping that lay in the Bay, to wit, twenty Gallies, ninety Sayles of Ships, whereof fiue were of thoſe great Gallions, which are called the Kings twelue Apoſtles, (all doubtleſſe the ſonnes of Thunder) two great Galliaſſes, three Frigats, three Argoſies, twenty Biſkaines; the reſt were Merchants Ships, rich and of great burden, whoſe ladings were munition, coyne, oyle, wine, waxe, ſilke, cloth of gold, and quick-ſiluer; ſome bound for the Indians, ſome for Britaine, ſome for Lisbon, and ſome for other places. Newes moſt acceptable vnto the Generals, who haſting thitherwards, vpon Sunday the twentieth of Iune, aſſayed at the Friery of Saint Sebaſtian, on the Weſt ſide of Cadiz to land their men, but the place ſtrong, and the Seas going high, their purpoſe was hindered.

Iune 18.

The King of Spaines twelue Apoſtles, but farre vnlike Chriſts.

The rich ladings of the Spaniſh Ships.

(271) May I relate with hope of credit what others haue reported vpon their owne eye-ſight? At the firſt approach of this Royall Nauy before Cadiz, a faire Doue (a fortunate Preſager) betimes in the morning, is ſaid to haue lighted vpon the Mayne-yard of the Lord Admirals Ship, and there to haue ſate quietly the ſpace of three houres, euery man gazing, but no man ſuffered to harme her: as alſo the laſt day of their departure thence, another Doue preſented her ſelfe in the ſame manner, and in the ſame Ship, growing wonderfully tame and familiar with the men, and ſo continued with them, till they came into England.

A fortunate preſage.

(272) The day following their approach, being the firſt of the weeke, the Spaniſh Ships in the road in number fifty nine, attended with twentie Gallies by the aduice of their * Admirall, ſhot with the tide within the point of Maine-land, vnto Caſtle Puntall, and in the ſtraits of the Bay, ſorted themſelues in good order, and of a reaſonable diſtance, as well to offend the enemy, as to relieue each others interchangeably.

* Diego Soto.

(273) The Bay was narrow whereunto they had entred, full of Rockes, Shelues, and Sands, all which notwithſtanding, it was in Councell determined, that the Lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Rawleigh, Sir Francis Vere, Sir George

George Carew, and Sir Robert Southwell, with ſome Londoners, and a Squadron of the Low-Countrey Ships ſhould begin the fight; which was moſt valiantly attempted, maintained, and continued, the thundring ſhot battering their bulkes, and renting their ſhrowdes.

(274) In the heate whereof, the Earle of Eſſex, (in Councell appointed to keep the Maine Battell) vpon the ſudden from Port S. Maries ſide, thruſt himſelfe formoſt in this Sea-fight, which the other Generall perceiuing, and the Arke Royall too vnweldy for that narrow water, took into his Pinnace, and forwarded the fight to the end: Meane while the Gallies were aſſayled by Sir Iohn Winkefield, who with his ſmall ſhips ſo hanſelled their ſides, as they were forced to creepe by the Shore, and ſo got paſſage at the Bridge, contrary to the expectation of the Engliſh, whoſe eyes were euer ayming at the faireſt Marke, which indeed was the Philip, ſo battered with Bullets, that he began to ſtagger, and giue ouer fight; whoſe Souldiers ſeeking to ſaue themſelues by water, and ſwimming, ſet this Apoſtle (their Admirall) on fire, by whoſe example, the S^t. Thomas, another of Spaines Apoſtles, did the like, leſt the Engliſh ſhould leade them in triumph of their victory. The reſt of the Spaniſh Fleet ranne themſelues on ground in the Bay of Port Reall, to gaine ſome breathing time from their ſtill following purſuers.

The Spaniſh Admirall ſet on fire.

(275) Theſe ſeruices thus forwarded, the Earle of Eſſex forthwith landed his men vnder the Blockhouſe Puntall, about a mile Weſt-ward from Cadiz, whence it was thought expedient to ſend ſome Regiments to the Bridge, on the Weſt of the Iland, to impeach all ſuccours that ſhould come from the Maine: To which ſeruice were ſent Sir Chriſtopher Blunt, Sir Thomas Gerrard, (now Lord Gerrard) and Sir Coniers Clifford with a power of twelue hundred ſtrong. Meane while the Generall Eſſex, with the Earle of Suſſex, Count Lodowicke, Lord Harbert, Lord Burk, Sir George Carew (now Lord Carew) and others tooke towards Cadiz.

The Engliſh goe on Land.

(276) The ſide of their entrance was fortified with a Wall through the necke of the Promontory from Sea to Sea, and a Counter-skarpe raiſed ſome diſtance, where were built two Bull-warks, and a Curtaine for the ſtronger defence of the Towne; the enemy hauing alſo an aduantage from the higher aſcent, played ſore vpon the Engliſh to their great annoyance, inſomuch that the formoſt began to giue backe from the Gate, which the Earle of Eſſex perceiuing, to engage his Souldiers reſolutions, caught his owne Colours, and caſt them ouer the Wall into the Towne, giuing withall a moſt hot aſſault vnto the Gate, where to ſaue the honour of their Enſigne, happy was hee that could firſt leape downe from the Wall, and with ſhot and Sword make way thorow the thickeſt preſſe of the enemy. The Towne thus ſurprized, the Lord Admirall haſted to ſecond the charge, when a hot encounter enſued: for the ſtreetes were very narrow, ſo as but two could march on breſt, and from their flat-roofed Houſes, heapes of ſtones were tumbled downe, to the great hurt of many of the Engliſh, who neuertheleſſe droue the enemy before them into the Market place, where the worthy Sir Iohn Winckfield, ſore wounded at the gate in his thigh, was ſhot with a Musket from a loope-hole of the Caſtle into the head, and preſently dyed.

Sir John Winckfield ſlaine.

(277) But the Towne and Caſtle ſurrendred, a Proclamation was made to ſtay the fury of the Souldiers, and the ſlaughter of the Spaniard, with commandement vpon paine of death, that no man ſhould offer violence or harme to any religious perſon, woman or childe. And ſuch honourable care had the LL. Generals for the Inhabitants, that they ſent them in their owne Pinnaces vnto Porto Sancta Maria; the Ladies and Gentlewomen firſt, who were ſuffered to depart in their coſtlieſt apparell, and richeſt Iewels: and to ſaue them from the ſpoiles, or any the leaſt wrong of the ruder Souldiers or Seamen, the Generals themſelues in perſons ſtood at the water-ſides, to ſee them ſhipped without hurt or violence.

The Chriſtian vſage of the Engliſh towards the conquered.

(278) The rich Biſhop of Cuſco being taken Priſoner, without any ranſome was releaſed, and all other of ſacred Orders or Habit, ſuffered without touch to depart; ſuch was the Heroicall Clemency of theſe moſt Noble and truly-Engliſh Generals, to the great glory of our Nation, as the Spaniards themſelues were forced to confeſſe. The Towne thus wonne, the ſpoyle thereof was giuen to the Engliſh Captaines and Souldiers, the wearing clothes of the Inhabitants onely excepted, and the Citizens compounding with the Lords Generals, to pay an hundred and twenty thouſand Ducats for their ranſome, were ſuffered to depart: for payment whereof, forty of the chiefeſt Citizens, Canalleroes, Clergy-men and Merchants, were brought pledges into England, till the money was paid.

Iob. Stowes Annal.

(279) The like accord was attempted by the Ships which had runne themſelues on ground; whoſe number was about fifty two, many of them Merchants, and all moſt richly laden, as might ſeeme by the offers they made; for no leſſe then two Millions and an halfe of Ducats were offered by them for the redemption: but the LL. Generals more minding honour & the ſeruice they came for, would heare of no compoſition but for the Merchants ſhips onely, which whileſt it was in trauiſe to and fro, the Duke of Medina Sidonia, Admirall of Spaine, commanded them all together to be ſet on fire, which was ſuddenly done: & the flames terribly mounting, forced the pitchy ſmoake, as thicke clouds to darken the Aire. Among theſe were two of the Spaniſh Apoſtles, the Mathew and the Andrew; the firſt of which was ſaued by the Lord Admirals direction, and the ſecond was quenched by Sir Thomas Gerrard, in whoſe bottome himſelfe returned for England.

The Ships make offer for their redemption.

(280) Thus in an inſtant, a Fleet, full of men, merchandize, victuall, armour, and twelue hundred Peeces of Ordnance, all valued by themſelues at twelue Millions of Ducats, was ſuddenly ſunke, conſumed or taken; the Towne alſo ranſacked, euery ſouldier bringing ſome portion of her rich ſpoiles into England, to ſhew the ſeruice he performed at Cadiz. The Towne they burnt, ſauing the Churches only: the Walles they battered, & Towers demoliſhed, the Iland it ſelf they burned, razed & ſpoiled, laying all waſte before them, and leauing the rubbiſh to declare the ruines which the Engliſh had made.

The value of the loſſe in the Spaniſh Ships.

(281) Vpon the fift of Iuly the Earle of Eſſex with his abandoned Cadiz, the L. Admirall being gone on boord ſome ſixe dayes before, and the next day the whole Fleet ſet ſayle Weſtward towards Faro a Towne in Algarua; where the Earle deſirous to doe ſome further exploit vpon the terra firma of Spaine, landed his men (the L. Admirall on boord ſecuring the Seas) and marching to Faro, he found it empty of men, the Inhabitants being fled with much of their ſubſtance, and the Towne left deſtitute of victuall: yet in the Nunnery and in the Biſhops Palace, ſome goods were found, and in the Library Bookes valued at a thouſand Markes; and among other prizes of note, the faireſt Culuering the King of Spaine had, was there found, and ſeazed vpon; the Engliſh forraged the Country for three leagues about, & burnt the Towne Lotha without any reſiſtance.

The attempt on the firme land.

(282) Thence the firſt of Auguſt the LL. Generals fell before the Groine, where ſeeing no Ships ſtirring, and the Seas altogether cleared; vpon the ſeuenth of the ſame moneth they ſafely and very richly arriued at Plymouth, to the great honor of England, glory of their Queen, and renowne of their owne valours, and famous aduentures.

The Engliſh returne.

(283) But as the wrongs offered by the Spaniards, ſeemed to the Engliſh far greater then was yet the reuenge: ſo alſo the moſt prudent Queene held it ſtill fit to find K. Philip more worke at home, and therefore a third voyage was vndertaken the yeere following, whereof Robert Earle of Eſſex was made as well Lord Generall for the Land, as Admirall for the Sea, hauing for the one ſeruice, his Vice-Admirall the Lord Thomas Howard, Knight of the Order, and his Rere-Admirall, Sir Walter Rawleigh, Captaine of the Guard; for the other, his Lieutenant Generall was Charles Lord Mountioy, Knight of the Order; his Marſhall, Sir Francis Vere Coronell Generall of the Low-Countries Forces; Sir George Carew Lord Preſident of Munſter, Maſter of his Ordnance; and Sir Ferdinando Gorge, Sergeant Major of the Field. The whole number conſiſted of ſix thouſand men beſides Mariners, for which an hundred and twenty Ships were furniſhed, whereof ſeuenteene were her Maieſties, ſixty men of Warre, the reſt for victuall and tranſportation. Theſe vpon the ninth of Iuly were embarked at Plimouth for the Ilands of Azores, and hauing cleared ſixty Leagues, fell foule by a Tempeſt, and were driuen backe againe to Plimouth, and againe thence ſet Sayle vpon the 17. of Auguſt next following.

(284) Vpon the fifteenth of September they fell with the Iles Flores, Euernes, Fayall, and Pike; all which ſubmitted themſelues to the Lord Generals deuotion; whence weying their Anchors, they made ſayle for Saint Michaels, and there before the Towne caſt them againe, where it was determined that Sir Walter Rawleigh ſhould keepe the Sea, whileſt the Lord Generall with two thouſand ſhould land elſe-where in the Iland; which they did, & ſacked the rich towne

Villa Franca: but the Seas going high, and the Winter ſtormes approaching, after the ſpoile of thoſe places, the deſtruction of a Carracke richly laden with Sugars, fired by her owne men, the taking of a Braſile man, and the ſurprize of three prizes which they brought into England, valued at foure hundred thouſand Ducats, they returned, the Spaniard euery where hauing the worſt.

(285) Theſe ſtirres on the Seas brought yet further miſchiefes on the Spaniard, by hindring the trafficke of Merchandize, as well for their owne trade and commerce with others, as for others trading into Spaine; among whom Sigiſmund, the young and new elected King of Polonia, found himſelfe moſt agrieued: whoſe Ambaſſador for that buſineſſe vnto the Queene, was one Paulus de Ialine, a Polone Gentleman, learned, eloquent, and very audacious, (if not ouer-much) who bringing * Letters of credence from his King, had audience at Greenwich, her Maieſty ſitting vnder her cloth of Eſtate, and with her Nobles, attending the ſumme of his meſſage, which the Polonian began with more then an ordinary Grace.

Sigiſmund King of Polonia his Ambaſſage to the Queene.

* Dated the 19. of May.

July 25.

(286) Whoſe tenour was filled with blaſts of diſcontent, conceiued by his potent Maſter the King of Polonia, and cauſed by the grieuances of his Merchants, who not onely were depriued of ſome priuiledges in England, but the Sea which is made free by the omnipotent, ſtopped, and the trades of his Merchants into Spaine by her Highneſſe Edicts debarred, contrary to the law both of Nature and of Nations: that his Maſter, as he could not bee mooued to diminiſh any part of his loue towards her Maieſty, ſo yet could hee not but relieue his owne ſubiects, and the rather for that it touched all his Nobility; whoſe reuenewes conſiſted chiefly vpon the Trade of Merchandizing. That he had hitherto forborne all meanes of requite, though her Maieſty well knew, of meanes hee had no want; and now had ſent to aduertiſe her Highneſſe in a louing manner by him his Ambaſſador, ſeeing that his Letters to that purpoſe heretofore ſent, had not beene regarded, in whoſe name he now required, that the Seas might be open, a reſtitution made, and the Trade Weſtward to Spaine free, according to equity; otherwiſe his Maſter would no longer neglect his Subiects loſſes, but would take in hand a meanes of redreſſe. As for her Maieſties warres with Spaine, that ought not to hinder Nauigation by the common Law of Nature (as hee auouched) nor for her reſpect ſhould the ancient friendſhip betwixt the Potent Polonian and the mighty King of Spaine be broken, nor with the houſe of Auſtria, whoſe daughter his Prince had now married, which bound him in a double bond of loue. But he truſted (his Maſters requeſt bearing ſuch equitie) her Maieſty would regard it, and command ſatisfaction of theſe things forthwith to bee made, to the content of his Prince, and ſafety of her ſelfe; which thing he wiſhed, and thereof warned her Maieſty. And with other like words ended as peremptorily as he began.

The ſumme of the Ambaſſadors Oration.

(287) Vnto which confident Oration, the Queene her ſelfe not brooking to be braued by any Prince in the World, preſently made anſwer, preuenting the Lord Chancellor therein, who was about to do it, and both roundly and learnedly in the Latine (the ſame language wherein the meſſage was deliuered) replyed: the very words as neere as could be taken from her mouth were theſe:

Queene Elizabeths anſwer to the Polonian.

(288) Heu quàm decepta fui! Expectaui Nuncium: tu verò querelam mihi adduxiſti; per literas te accepiſſe Legatum, te verò Heraldum inuenio. Nunquam in vita talem Orationem audiui. Miror, ſanè miror, tantam & tam inſolutam in publico audaciam; neque puto ſi Rex tuus adeſſet, talia verba protuliſſet: Sin aliquid tale tibi in mandatis commiſit (quod quidem valdè dubito) attribuendum, quod cùm Rex ſit iuuenis, & non tam iure Sanguinis quàm Electionis, atque etiam nouitèr electus, non tam benè percipiat quid inter Reges conuenit, quàm Maiores ſui nobiſcum obſeruarunt, & alij fortaſſe deinceps obſeruabunt. Quod at te attinet, videris multos libros perlegiſſe, libros tamen Principum non attigiſſe, neque intelligere quid inter Reges conuenit. Cùm verò Ius Naturæ & Gentium commemoras; Hoc ſcito eſſe Ius Naturæ & Gentium, vt cum bellum inter Reges intercedat, liceat alteri alterius vndique allata Præſidia intercipere, & ne in damnum ſuum conuertantur, præuidere: Hoc ſcito eſſe Ius Naturæ & Gentium; Vbi itidem Domum Auſtriæ narras (quam iam tanti facis) non te lateat ex eadem Domo non defuiſſe qui Regnum Poloniæ Regi tuo intercipere voluiſſent. De reliquis quæ cùm multa ſunt, & ſingulatim deliberanda, non ſunt huius loci ac temporis, accipies quod à quibuſdam Conſiliarijs huic rei deſignatis deliberandum fuerit. Interim valeas & quieſcas.

(288) Oh how was I deceiued! I looked for an Embaſſage, but thou haſt brought me complaints; I vnderſtood by thy Letters that thou wert a Legate; but I find thee an Herauld; neuer ſince I drew breath, heard I ſuch an Oration. I maruell truly, I maruell at ſo great and ſuch an accuſtomed boldneſſe in ſo publike an aſſembly; neither doe I thinke if the King thy Maſter were preſent, that hee would ſay ſo much: but if peraduenture he hath committed any ſuch thing to thy charge (which ſurely I do much doubt) it is to be imputed vnto him, that where the King is of yeeres vnripe, and not by blood, but by election (yea & but newly aduanced) hee doth not ſo perfectly vnderſtand the courſe of negotiating theſe kinde of affaires with other Princes, which either his Anceſtors haue obſerued with vs, or perhaps others will obſerue, who afterwards ſhall ſucceed him. As touching thy ſelfe, indeed thou ſeemeſt to mee to haue read many Bookes, but not to haue peruſed the Bookes of Princes affaires, but vtterly to be ignorant what is conuenient amongſt Kings. And whereas thou makeſt mention of the Law of Nature and Nations; know, that this is the Law both Naturall and Nationall, that when Warre is waged among Princes, it is lawfull for one of them to intercept the military helpes of the other, brought from what place ſoeuer, ſo to preuent the harmes which might otherwiſe redound on himſelfe: And this againe I auow to be the Law of Nature and Nations. Whereas likewiſe thou mentioneſt a new affinity with the Houſe of Auſtria, which now thou makeſt ſo famous, and of ſo deare eſteeme, forget not, Sir, that there haue bin of that Houſe that would haue bereft the Kingdom of Polonia from thy King. As for other points which be not to be ſpoken of at this place, & time, becauſe they are many and ſeuerally to be conſidered of one after another: thou ſhalt wait for ſuch further anſwer as ſhall be reſolued on by ſome of my Councell, to whom I will aſſigne the conſideration of this matter: In the meane time farewell and be quiet. And thus Lyon-like riſing, daunted the malepert Orator no leſſe with her ſtately port and Maieſtical departure, then with the tartneſſe of her Princely checkes: and turning to the Train of her Attendants, thus ſaid; Gods death, my Lords (for that was her oath euer in anger) I haue beene enforced this day to ſcowre vp my old Latine, that hath laine long in ruſting.

Sept. 7.

(289) To entreat a peace betwixt theſe Chriſtian Princes of England and Spaine, the King of Denmarke likewiſe did ſend an Ambaſſage vnto Queene Elizabeth, as alſo to deliuer the Garter worne by his Predeceſſor lately departed this world, with an earneſt entreaty to continue the amity betwixt their two Realmes. The man was Arnald Whitfield Chancellor of Denmarke, iudicious, learned and wiſe, who with farre better temper and tearmes well couched, deliuered his Oration; which ended, he moſt humbly propounded certaine requeſts (whereunto her Maieſty preſently replyed) which in effect were theſe:

The Daniſh Ambaſſadors requeſts.

(290) 1. That the League of Peace confirmed betwixt the Crowns of England and Denmarke, might be continued, as formerly it had beene in the late deceaſed Kings dayes, and other his Predeceſſors, which now the preſent King his Maſter did inſtantly deſire: To which She anſwered, that She was moſt willing thereunto, wiſhing that the now-King would preſerue the ſame amity no worſe then his Predeceſſors had done.

2 That whereas much Chriſtian blood was ſpilt in theſe continuall warres betwixt England and Spaine, it would pleaſe her Maieſty to giue her conſent, that the King his Maſter might make a motion of Peace; and as he found the occaſion, ſo to proceed. Whereunto ſhee replyed, that ſhe thought his King was too yong, and vnexperienced, to conceiue throughly the cauſe of breach betwixt Her and Spaine; and as the League had not beene broken on Her part, or with Her Royall conſent, ſo an accord ſhould not bee ſought after by Her, nor by any in Her behalfe: for (quoth ſhee) I would haue the King of Denmarke, and all Princes Chriſtian and Heathen to know, that England hath no need to craue Peace; nor my ſelfe endured one houres feare, ſince I attained the Crowne thereof, being guarded with ſo valiant and faithfull Subiects.

An heroicke anſwer of an vndaunted Queene.

3 His third requeſt was, if it ſtood with her Maieſties good liking, to permit open traffique, that the Merchants of Denmarke might tranſport their goods into Spain without danger on the narrow Seas, as heretofore ſome of them had ſuſtained to their great loſſe. Her Maieſties anſwer was, that it was to her vnknowne, that any of his Maſters good Subiects were in any wiſe moleſted, or their goods ſtayed, and that vpon iuſt proofe proofe thereof made, a redreſſe ſhall be ordained, to the full ſatisfaction of the King, and content of his Subiects.

4 Laſtly, he was to returne the Garter, (wherewith her Majeſty had honoured the late deceaſed King) as the manner is of forraine Princes to doe, which he with great reuerence there deliuered: Which her Maieſty accepting; yet told him, ſhee was right ſorry to receiue it, for thereby ſhee was put in minde of the loſſe of a moſt Noble Brother, and a moſt louing friend. But howſoeuer the Daniſh Merchants now complained of loſſe, the Engliſh Merchandize were arreſted in the Sound, for releaſe whereof, Ambaſſadours were ſent into Denmarke, where a reſtitution was made by the King, with ſuch honour and bounty, as well ſatisfied her Maieſty, and contented her Merchants.

Tir-Oens rebellion in Ireland.

(291) But a more dangerous Agent, working for Spaine, was the Iriſh Tir-Oen, who ſerpent-like lay lurking vpon his aduantage to raiſe the Standard of Rome, and to diuert ſubiection from the Engliſh Crowne. This mans fortunes wee haue formerly declared, how being the ſonne of a Baſtard, and a baniſhed fugitiue, hee was raiſed by her Majeſties * meer bounty, to the dignity of an Earle, and ſtood in authority ranked with the beſt; nor ſo onely, but being twice in danger of capitall crimes (once for a murther, next for vſurping the Title of O-Neale) vpon better hopes of her princely clemency, twice got pardon for his life. The times now dangerous, and Ireland too ready to receiue forraine powers, it was thought conuenient to imploy S^r Iohn Norris (that famous Warriour) into thoſe parts, with thirteene hundred of the Netherland old Souldiers, newly retired from the wars in Britaine.

* See Cambdens Brit. in Ireland.

Sir Iohn Norris ſent into Ireland.

Tir-Oens firſt flying out.

(292) Hugh Baron of Dungannon, now Earle of Tir-Oen, fearing leſt the the Engliſh would make their neſts where himſelfe meant, to build, namely in ſome Caſtle at the mouth of Lough-Earne, ſuddenly aſſailed the Fort of Black-water, by which the entry lay into his Countrey, and got it by ſurrender. Which done, he wrote to Kildare, to ſide with him againſt his wrongs receiued of the Lord Deputy; yea and at the ſame inſtant, to Sir Iohn Norris (appointed Lord Generall) that he might be mildly dealt with, and not bee driuen head-long vpon the dangerous rockes of diſloyalty.

Tir-Oen gets the Fort of Black-water.

(293) But how his loyalty ſtood affected vnto her Maieſty (his Raiſer) was well perceiued by the powers which hee retained about him, being alwaies guarded with a thouſand horſemen, and ſixe thouſand two hundred and foureſcore foot of Vlſter, beſides two thouſand three hundred of Conaught, which euer lay ready at his command; whereupon all of them being proclaimed Traitors; the flames of rebellion began more violently to burſt forth, which for a long time, and not without loſſe of much blood, could hardly be quenched: for though the Lord Generall were not inferiour in ſtrength of men, yet the aduantages of the enemy were ſuch, that the time was rather ſpent in taking of booties, and friuolous Parlies, then in any memorable exploit; the one part waiting for fitter opportunities, and the other looking euery day for his promiſed ſuccours from Spaine.

He and his adherents proclaimed Traitors.

(294) But to ſpare the effuſion of Chriſtian blood, Queene Elizabeth, who euer minded Mercy more then Iuſtice, cauſed her Treaſurer and Chiefe Iuſticiar of that Kingdome, as her Commiſſioners, to confer with this diſcontented Earle, and others his adherents: before whom, Tir-Oen complained of wrongs offered him by Sir Henry Bagnall Marſhall, aſwell to the preiudice of his eſtate, as of his eſteeme with the Queen, the Lord Deputy, Lord Generall, and others; and thereupon exhibited a Petition in humble manner containing theſe requeſts; That himſelfe and all his followers might be pardoned of their crimes, and be reſtored to their former eſtates; that they might freely exerciſe their Romiſh Religion without moleſtation; that no Garriſon Souldiers, Shiriffe, or other Officer ſhould interdeale within the iuriſdiction of his Earledome; that the company of fifty horſemen with the Queenes pay might be reſtored to him, in the ſame State as formerly hee had led them; that the ſpoilers of his Country and people might be puniſhed, and that Sir Henry Bagnall ſhould pay him a thouſand pound promiſed in Dowry with his Siſter, whom Tir-Oen had married, and who was now deceaſed. Others likewiſe laid out their grieuances cõceiued; ſuch were O-Donell, Brian Mac-Hugh-Oge, Mac Mahun, and Euer Mac-Conley, who receiued moſt reaſonable anſwers to all their demands.

Sir Henry Wallop.
Sir Rob. Gardiner.

(295) But vnto them the Commiſſioners likewiſe propoſed certaine Articles: as, That they ſhould forthwith lay down their their Armes, diſperſe their forces, acknowledge ſubmiſſiuely their diſloyalties, admit the Queenes Officers in their Gouernments, reedifie the Forts they had defaced, ſuffer the Garriſons to liue without diſturbance, make reſtitutions of ſpoiles taken, confeſſe vpon their oath how farre they had dealt with forraine Princes, and finally to renounce all forraine ayde. But theſe propoſitions not pleaſing the palate of thoſe Rebels, they departed with a reſolution to maintaine their owne demands. Which mooued Norris the Generall, ayded with the Lord Deputy, to march with his Army vnto Armagh; whoſe approch (euer dreadfull to his enemies) when Tir-Oen heard of, in great perplexity he forſooke the Fort of Black-water, ſet on fire the villages about, and plucked downe the Towne of Dunganon, with part of his owne houſe, bewayling his eſtate to be paſt recouery, and was ſo much deiected in minde, as he fought nothing elſe but where to hide his rebellious head.

Propoſitions made to the Rebels.

Preparations againſt Tir-Oen.

(296) The Country now waſted, and no victuals to be had, Norris ſet a Garriſon in the Church of Armagh, ſtrengthned Monahan, and proclaimed Tir-Oen Traytor in his owne territories. Which done, hee ſtayed in Vlſter without any great deeds of martiall importance, onely Tir-Oen to gain time, preſented vnto him a fained ſubmiſſion, ſigned with his owne hand, caſt himſelfe downe (a rare and vncouth ceremony) at the Queenes pictures feet, vngirt his ſword, and craued pardon vpon his knees: and yet in the meane time dealt he for aydes out of Spaine, and ſo farre preuailed, as that Meſſengers were ſent from King Philip with capitulations that the King of Spaine at a time prefixed ſhould ſend them a competent Army to ioyne with the Iriſh, that all conditions of peace with the Engliſh ſhould be reiected, and that the Rebels ſhould be furniſhed with munition from Spaine.

(297) Hereupon (though there was a ceſſation from Armes) hee fell to harry and waſte the Country, to burn villages, to driue away booties, and hauing done what he could or would, as it were pricked in conſcience, he once againe put on the vizard of ſimulation, & ſued for pardon and peace: which the better to effect, he ſent the Letters of King Philips promiſes, vnto the Lord Deputy, with the cauſes of his owne diſcontents, which mooued him to doe what he did. And ſurely ſuch was his dexteritie, or his Deſtiny, or the Engliſh no leſſe dangerous, then frequent ſecurity, negligence and confidence, or the ſparing of money by the grand diſburſers, or the inbred lenity of the too-clement Queene, that his faire words were euer beleeued, and his foule offences pardoned: but whoſe fault ſoeuer, moſt of Connaught was now reuolted, all Vlſter rebellious, onely ſeuen Caſtels kept for the Queene.

(298) In which deſperate eſtate, Thomas L. Burrough, a man full of courage, was ſent L. Deputy into Ireland; who no ſooner arriued, but Norris either croſſed by ſome higher-ſwaying Powers, or by his fortune in this his proceeding (the ſeruices there being farre different from thoſe his others, in other parts imployed) through griefe and diſcontent (the too vſuall guerdon of many a Noble Seruitor) as was thought, ended his life.

(299) The Lord Deputy no ſooner had receiued the Sword, and taken the charge of the kingdome of Ireland, but he made forward to meete with the Rebels, holding it good policy to cut off delayes, which commonly increaſe the abilities of the enemy. Tir-Oen on the other ſide, as boldly made his reſiſtance, and in a dangerous ſeruice encountred him at the Moiry, where the Lord Burrough by his valour made the way, and moſt valiantly wanne the Fort of Blackwater, (repayred and re-enforced by the Rebels) the onely ſtrength (beſides Woods) that the Tir-Oen had. To reſcue this Peece, immediately the enemy ſhewed himſelfe: againſt whom Henry Earle of Kildare preſently marching with a Coronet of Horſe, and certaine voluntaries, (Gentlemen of the better ſort) where he diſcomfited the enemy, though with loſſe of ſome men of note; as of Francis Vaughan, brother to the Lord Deputies wife, Robert Turner Sergeant Major, and the two Foſter brethren of the Earle Kildare, whoſe deaths hee ſo tooke, as within few dayes after, himſelfe dyed for very griefe.

(300) The Fort re-enforced with men and Munition, and the Lord Deputy vpon ſeruice in other parts; Tir-Oen now wauering betweene hope, feare, and ſhame, thought beſt to aſſay it by ſiege, as the place of greateſt importance to further his deſignes; for that loſt, hee ſaw his fortunes muſt downe, and thereupon with his ſtrongeſt power, hee beleagured it. The Lord Deputy hearing thereof, prepared ſtraightway to reſcue the the place, and marching with full pace and assurance of victory, whether through too forward a minde, distemperature of body, ayre, or of bogges, arrested he was with sickneſſe, and violently cut off by vntimely death, leauing to her Maiesty a misse in her Irish Estate, and a further securitie to the ranging Rebels.

The Lord Burrough dyeth in Ireland.

An. Dom. 1698. The Earle of Ormond Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

(301) The Gouernment of Ireland was then committed to the Earle of Ormond, vnder the Title of Lieutenant Generall of the Army, and vnto the Lord Chancellor Sir Robert Gardiner; vnto whom Tir-Oen (after his accustomed manner) in a long Letter recapitulated his great gricuances, leauing not out the least offence of the Souldiers, or actions of the Sheriffes; his breach of couenants with Sir Iohn Norris he coldly excuseth, and laid his complaints against his enemies (the English) who had intercepted and suppressed his submission to the Queene, that they had raised intolerable impositions vpon the Nobles, and Commons; and that the reuenewes of Ireland were shared among Councellers, Lawyers, Souldiers, and Notaries: by which and other like ouertures, it was manifest that he intended to extirpate the English quite out of Ireland.

The English foyled at Black-water.

(302) All this while his Siege lay before the Fort of Black-water; for the raising whereof, Sir Henry Bagnall (the bitterest enemy that Tir-Oen euer had) with fourteene Enfignes of the choisest troops were sent, whom the Earle met neere vnto Armagh; and being egged on with a fretfull desire of reuenge, bent all his force against the Marshall, where began a bloody conflict, and was continued with the death of that worthy Souldier (fighting amongst the thickest) whereby Tir-Oen obtained not onely a ioyous triumph ouer his priuate enemy, but withall went away with a glorious victory ouer the English, who neuer since they first set footing in Ireland, receiued so great an ouerthrow: for therein thirteene valiant Captaines lost their liues; fifteene hundred common Souldiers were rowted and put to shamefull flight, disparkled and cut in pieces. Vpon this disaster the Garrison Souldiers (hauing with loyall hearts and weapons in hand, vnto extreme famine and exceeding distresse, held out to the last) lastly surrendred the Peece of Black-water vnto the Rebels; by which ouerthrow and surrender, the Irish became furnished with armour and munition to maintaine their warres, and Tir-Oen renowned all the Realme ouer, as their only Horatius, and founder of their freedome.

(303) Himselfe ouer-ioyed with these gotten victories, swelled aboue measure with an haughty arrogancy, commanding all things as sole Monarch of Ireland. Into Mounster hee sent Ouny Mac-Rory-Og-O-More with foure thousand preying rogues to forrage the Countrey, and the rabble that daily resorted vnto them, burnt the houses of the English, ransacked their substance, and killed very many; Iames Fitz-Thomas one of the family of the Desmonds, they set vp as Earle of Desmond, yet so, that he should hold as Tenant in Fee of the O-Neale, (the Earle of Tir-Oen) and thus after a moneth, when they had kindled this fire, and set Mounster in a flame, they returned laden with rich booties and spoile. Tir-Oen in the meane time had sent his Letters to King Philip of Spaine, wherein hee founded his victories with a full trumpet, assuring him that hee would heare of no peace with the English, were the conditions neuer so indifferent, and would for his part inuiolately keepe his promises with the Spanish King.

Robert Earle of Essex Lieutenant of Ireland.

(304) In this desperate estate stood Ireland, when Queene Elizabeth chose Robert Earle of Essex, to be Lord Lieutenant and Gouernour Generall thereof: a Peere in regard of his approoued wisedome, fortitude, and fidelitie, thought fittest to repaire the detriments and losses therein sustained, and in such deare esteeme with his Soueraigne, and intire loue of the people, as the heauens seemed to haue framed him for the delight of man. In whom shined all sparkles of true Nobility and Martiall honour, had not fortune marred all that the other graces had made. His Commission was large, and Authoritie great, and led no lesse then twenty thousand compleat Souldiers, whereof sixteene thousand were foot, and the rest horsemen, so well furnished and prouided, as the like had neuer beene seene before in Ireland.

(305) Thus honorably accompanied with the flower of English Gallants, and well-wishing acclamatiõs of the People, with a strange thunderclap in a cleere Sunne-shine day, hee set forward from London, and arriuing in Ireland, receiued the Sword; where (toward the end of March) falling in councell touching his affaires, it was thought fittest by wise

Statists

The Earle of Eſſex enters Mounſter.

Statiſts, that Mounſter ſhould be cleared of thoſe petty Rebels lying neerer, and of more validity then the remote Vlſter, of ſmall wealth and leſſe account. Wherupon, contrary to his owne opinion formerly deliuered (whiles hee was in England) and his directions from her Maieſty in Ireland, he made firſt into Mounſter, and became terrible vnto the Rebels of thoſe parts, chaſing them before him into the woods, and ſo cleared that Prouince, with more expence of time, and loſſe of men, then was here well liked by the State.

(306) Hence hee made into Leinſter, againſt the O-Coners and O-Moiles, who had gathered head and taken Armes againſt their obedience; whom in light skirmiſhes hee fortunately vanquiſhed; whence he ſent Sir Conyers Clifford Gouernour of Conaught one way towards Bellike, whilſt he himſelfe tooke another way, ſo to diſtract the force of Tir-Oen. Sir Conyers with a power of fifteene hundred ſtrong, marched ouer the Mountaines of Curlew, where O-Roirke and his Rebels ſuddenly aſſailed them, being out-wearied with trauell, and their powder neere ſpent; in which conflict, amongſt many other ſlaine, Sir Conyers Clifford himſelfe, as alſo Sir Alexander Ratcliffe, ſealed the teſtimony of their valours, with the loſſe of their liues.

Sir Conyers Clifford incountered with and ſlaine.

He enters Vlſter.

Sept. 13.

(307) The Lord Generall hearing of this ouerthrow, made towards Vlſter, and came into the frontiers as farre as Louth, where Tir-Oen, on the other ſide of the Riuer, from the Hils made his Brauado. But falling into his wonted vain of diſſimulation, deſired a parley with the Lord Lieutenant, which he altogether reiecting, anſwered, that if the Earle would conferre with him, he ſhould find him the next morning in the head of his troops: on which day, when after a light skirmiſh, a horſeman of Tir-Oens troops, with a loud voyce cryed, that the Earle was not willing to fight, but to parley vpon peace with the Lord Generall; it was againe denied him. But the next day, as the Lord Lieutenant was in his March forward, one Hagan ſent from Tir-Oen, met him, and declared that the Earle moſt humbly deſired to haue the Queenes mercy and peace; and withall beſought, that his Lordſhip would be pleaſed to afford him audience, which if he would grant, then would he with all reuerence attend him at the Foord of the Riuer not farre from Louth.

Tir-Oen ſueth for Parley, but is reiected.

(308) To this laſtly the Lord Lieutenant aſſented; and ſent to diſcouer the place, and beſtowing a troope of Horſe vpon the next Hill, came downe alone vnto the Riuer; Tir-Oen attending on the other ſide, no ſooner ſaw his approach, but forthwith rode his Horſe into the Riuer vp to the ſaddle, and with all ſemblances of a dutifull reſpect, moſt reuerently ſaluted his Lordſhip: where, hauing had conference the ſpace of an houre, they both returned vnto their companies. There followed the Earle of Eſſex, Con, a baſe ſonne of Tir-Oen, inſtantly intreating in his fathers name, that certaine principall men might be admitted to a conference: whereunto his Honour condiſcended.

Eſſex & Tir Oen meet in Parley.

A further conference.

(309) And taking with him the Earle of Southampton, Sir Geoage Bourchier, Sir Warham S^t. Leger, Sir Henry Danuers, Sir Edward Wingfield, and Sir William Conſtable, went to the Foord, where Tir-Oen, with his brother Cormoc, Mac Gennys, Mac Guir, Euer Mac Cowley, Henry Ouington, and O-Quin, attended their comming. And falling in conference, it was concluded, that certaine Commiſsioners ſhould the next day meete for a treaty of peace, and in the meane time there ſhould be a ceſſation of Wars, from ſixe weekes to ſixe weekes, vntill the firſt of May: yet ſo, as it might be free on both ſides, after fourteene dayes warning giuen, to reſume hoſtility afreſh. And if any of Tir-Oens confederates would not thereto conſent, to bee proſecuted at the Lord Lieutenants pleaſure.

An. Dom. 1599.

(310) But howſoeuer theſe his proceedings pleaſed the Marſhaliſts, yet was her Majeſty highly incenſed, that ſuch expeditions had beene made without her directions, being informed that the Spring, Summer, and Autumne were ſpent without ſeruice vpon the Arch-Rebell, that her men were diminiſhed, and large ſummes of money conſumed, without doing that for which hee was ſent; that by this meanes the Rebels were encouraged, and the Kingdome of Ireland laid at hazard to be loſt: Which his defaults (for ſo they were apprehended) were (as hee conceiued) much aggrauated by ſome that were hard againſt him in Her attentiue eare; vpon which ſurmize, Her Majeſties ſharpe Letters receiued, (though hee had excuſed his ſeruice by others, whom himſelfe ſent at the ſame ſeaſon) ſo oner-preſſed his troubled thoughts, as leauing his charge charge to bee managed by others, hee made into England, well hoping to pacifie his Soueraignes diſpleaſure with ſatisfaction from his owne mouth, and at Noneſuch had acceſſe to her preſence, where after a ſhort welcome, he was commanded to his Chamber; and ſoone after was committed to the cuſtody of the Lord Keeper.

An. Dom. 1599. Sept. 28. Octob. 2.

(311) No ſooner almoſt was the Lord Generall departed Ireland, but that Tir-Oen (notwithſtanding the ceſſation from warre) drawing his Forces together, addreſſed himſelfe for the Field, vnto whom Sir William Warren was ſent, to charge him with breach of promiſe: but hee ſwelling in pride, peremptorily anſwered, that his doings were according to couenants, hauing giuen warning before, and his cauſe iuſt, for that the Lord Lieutenant was committed in England, vpon whoſe honour he repoſed his whole Eſtate; neither would hee haue any thing to doe with the Councellors of Ireland, in whom (as he ſaid) he neuer found either ſafety or truth. And thereupon preſuming vpon Spaine, and giuing it forth that there would be ſhortly an alteration in England; he ſends O-Donell into Conaught, receiued tumultuous perſons, ſtrengthneth the weake, and comforteth the diſtruſtfull, glorying euery where that hee would reſtore againe the ancient Religion and liberty of Ireland, and expell the Engliſh from thence; to which end, ſome Money and Munition were ſent him from Spaine, with Indulgences from Rome; and (for an eſpeciall fauour) the Pope ſent him a Plume of Phœnix Feathers, for a Trophey of his victories, as Vrban long before him ſent a Coronet of Peacocks Tayles vnto King Iohn, when hee was firſt inueſted Lord of Ireland.

Tir Oen againe falls off.

The Popes preſent beſtowed on Tir-Oen.

(312) Tir-Oen thus feathered for a higher flight, Peacocke-like to ſhew his owne pride and greatneſſe by his perſonall preſence, vnder a religious pretext to worſhip a piece of the wooddē Croſſe of Chriſt, reputed to bee kept in the Monaſtery of the Holy Croſſe in Tipperary, in the mid-winter would thither on Pilgrimage; whence he ſent out Mac-Guir with a number of rifeling Robbers, to deſpoyle and prey on the peaceable Subiects; with whom Sir Warham Saint Leger met, and at the firſt Race with his Lance ran Mac-Guir thorow the body, and was by him runne thorow himſelfe. Wherupon Tir-Oen fearing more blowes, made ready to returne from Mounſter ſooner then was expected, or himſelfe meant.

(313) At this time Charles Blunt, Lord Mountioy (afterwards created Earle of Deuonſhire) was ſent Lord Lieutenant Generall into Ireland, who with ſmall port and little ſolemnity, entred vpon the Gouernment, the ſtate of that Countrey lying deſperately diſeaſed, and almoſt paſt recouery. At his firſt comming, hearing that Tir-Oen was to depart Mounſter, he haſtned to ſtop his paſſage in Fereall, and there to giue him Battell, which the Earle preuented by taking another way, hauing intelligence of the Lord Generals deſignes; but the Spring drawing on, the Deputy put himſelfe on his March towards Vlſter, with purpoſe to driue the Earle to a ſtand, whiles Sir Henry Docwra at Lough-foile, and Sir Mathew Morgan at Baloſhanon planted the Garriſons, which they with ſmall adoe effected, and ſuppreſſed the Rebels in diuers ouerthrowes.

The L. Mountioy Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

An. Dom. 1600.

In Febru.

In May.

(314) The Lord Generall likewiſe held Tir-Oen very hard, and with light skirmiſhes euer put him to the worſe, ſo that hee now perceiuing his fortune to goe backe, with-drew himſelfe backe into his old corners. The Lord Lieutenant then entred into Leaſe, the place of refuge and receit of al the Rebels in Leinſter, where hee ſlew Ony-Mac Rory-Og, chiefe of the family of the O-Mores, a bloody, bold, and deſperate young man: and ſo chaſed out the reſt of thoſe his Rake-hels, as that neuer ſince they were ſeene in thoſe parts. And although in the commenſing of theſe affaires, the Equinox was paſt, and the Winter weather begun in that Climate, yet marched hee forward to the entrance of the Moyery three miles beyond Dundalke.

(315) The paſſage into Vlſter is euery where naturally cumberſome, and this way made more by the Rebels, who had fortified and blocked vp the entrance with fences of ſtakes ſtuck in the ground, with hurdles ioyned together, and ſtones in the midſt, with turfes of earth laid betwixt hils, woods, and bogges, and manned the place with a number of Souldiers: notwithſtanding, the Engliſh brake thorow thoſe Palliſadoes, and beating the enemies backe, the Lord Deputy placed a Garriſon eight miles from Armagh, where, in memory of Sir Iohn Norris, hee named the Fort Mount-Norris: but to omit many other skirmiſhes miſhes in his returne, that at Carlingfrod was moſt famous, where the enemies aſſembled to ſtop his way, were all of them diſcomfited, and put to fearefull flight.

The Glinnes cleered of Rebels.

(316) In the midſt of Winter hee entred the Glinnes, that is, the Vallies of Leinſter, a ſecure receptacle of the Rebels, where hee brought into ſubiection Donel Spanioh, Phelim Mac-Feogh, and the O-Tooles, of whom he tooke hoſtages. Then went he to Fereall, and draue Tirrell, the moſt approoued warrier of all the Rebels, from his faſtneſſe, (that is, his bogges and buſhes) into Vlſter; the Territory of Fernes hee laid waſte, ſpoyled Fues, and in Breany placed a Garriſon, receiuing ſuch into mercy as deliuered vp hoſtages. Which done, and the Spring approaching, he marched to Vlſter, fortified Armagh, and went ſo farre forward, that he remooued Tir-Oen from the Fort of Blacke-water, who had very artificially encamped himſelfe there.

The Pope and Spaine buſied to hold vp Tir-Oen.

(317) As the Lord Generall was thus buſied to reduce Ireland to obedience, ſo the Pope, and Spaine ſtudied to hold vp Tir-Oen, & to maintaine the Rebellions; their Agents were a Spaniard, elected by the Pope Archbiſhop of Dublin, the Biſhop of Cloufort, the Biſhop of Killaloe, and Archer a Ieſuite. Theſe by Prayer, and promiſes of heauenly rewards, wonne Philip to ſend ſuccours into Ireland, which forthwith hee did, vnder his Generall Don Iohn D' Aquila, a man of a conceited hope that all would be his, as confident of much aid from the titular Earle Deſmond, and from Florence Mac-Carty, a Rebell of great might; wherein hee was deceiued: for Sir George Carew, Lord Preſident of Mounſter, had preuented that deſigne, and ſent them priſoners into England, where they were kept ſure.

Don Iohn De Aquila ſent into Ireland.

(318) Don D' Aqnila with two thouſand Spaniards, all of them old trayned Souldiers, with certaine Iriſh Fugitiues, landed at Kinſale in Mounſter, the laſt of October, and ſtraight-wayes publiſhed a writing, wherein hee glorioufly ſtyled himſelfe with this Title, Maſter Generall, and Captaine of the Catholike King in the Warres of GOD, for holding and keeping the Faith in Ireland; indeauouring to make the World beleeue, that Queene Elizabeth, by the definitiue ſentences of the Popes, was depriued of her Kingdomes, and Her Subiects abſolued and freed from their Oath of Allegiance, and that he was come to deliuer them out of the Diuels iawes, and the Engliſh tyranny; vpon which ſuggeſtions, many diſtempered and wicked perſons began to bandy on his ſide.

Don Iohns Title.

(319) The Lord Deputy gathering his Companies, haſted to Kinſale, and encamped neere vnto the Towne on the Land ſide, whiles Sir Richard Leuiſon with two of the Queenes Ships incloſed the Hauen, to forbid all acceſſe to the Spaniard; when from both ſides, the thundering Cannon played vpon the Towne: but newes being brought that two thouſand Spaniards more were arriued at Bere-Hauen, Baltimore, and Caſtle-Hauen, Sir Richard was imployed vpon them, in which ſeruice hee ſunke fiue of their Ships.

A new ſupply of Spaniards vnder Alphonſo O-Campo.

(320) Vnto theſe new-landed Spaniards, whoſe Leader was Alphonſo-O-Campo, O-Donel ouer the yce, by ſpeedy iournies and vnknowne by-wayes repaired, vnſeene of the Engliſh; and a few dayes after, Tir-Oen himſelfe, with O-Roicke, Raimund Burke, Mac-Mahun, Randall Mac-Surley, Tirrell the Baron of Lixnaw, and the moſt ſelected choyce of all the Rebels came vnto them, who muſtered together, made ſixe thouſand Foot, and fiue hundred Horſe; all confident of victory, as being freſh, ſtrong, and exceeding in number, where, the Engliſh were outwearied through Winter ſiege, with ſcarſity of victuall, and their Horſe weake with ſore trauell.

Tir Oens brauadoes.

(321) In this hope, Tir-Oen, vpon an Hill not a mile from the Engliſh Campe, made a Brauado two dayes together, intending to haue put theſe new ſupplyes of Spaniards, with eight hundred Iriſh, by night into Kinſale, as by Letters intercepted from Don D' Aquila did appeare. Which to preuent, the Lord Deputy appointed eight Enſignes to keepe watch, and himſelfe with the Preſident of Mounſter, and the Marſhall, at the foot of the Hill, choſe out a conuenient plot to giue the Earle battell, who the next morning ſeeing the Engliſh ſo forward, by his Bag-pypers ſounded the retreat, whom the Lord Generall followed, and forced them to ſtand in the brinke of a bogge, where their Horſemen were diſordered, and rowted by the Earle of Clan-Ricard.

The Rebels rowted.

(322) The maine battell then wauering in feare, was violently charged by the Lord Deputy himſelfe, who in his directions diſcharged the part of a worthy Commander, and in fighting, the Office

Office of a valiant Souldier; for the Rebels not able to withſtand his fury, brake their arrayes, and in diſorder confuſedly fled; in whoſe purſuit many of them felt the reuenging edge of the Engliſh Sword. Tir-Oen, O-Donel, and the reſt flung away their weapons, and ſaued their liues by flight; but Alphonſo O-Campo, with three other Spaniſh Captaines, and ſixe Enſigne-Bearers, were taken priſoners, nine of their Enſignes borne away by the Engliſh, and twelue hundred of his Spaniards ſlaine; ſuch welcome found theſe new gueſts in Ireland. This victory obtained, both quelled the pride of the intruding Spaniards, and exceedingly daunted the hearts of the diſloyall Iriſh; ſo that Tir-Oen was forced into his ſtarting holes in Vlſter, O-Donell driuen into Spaine, and the reſt of that rebellious rabble ſcattered into obſcure places, where their beſt ſuccour was to play leaſt in ſight.

Don Alphonſo taken Priſoner.

The Rebels diſparkled.

(323) The Lord Generall returning to the ſiege of Kinſale, began to raiſe Rampires, and to mount his Cannons neerer the Towne, wherein ſixe dayes were ſpent without any impeach from the Spaniard, whoſe courage being cut by the loſſe of their fellowes, ſought rather how to get cleare and be gone, then to aduenture reſiſtance againſt ſuch a Warlike oppoſer. D' Aquila hereupon ſent his Letters by his Drumme Major to the Lord Deputy, wherein he craued, that ſome Gentleman of credit might be ſent into the Towne, with whom hee might parley for a Peace. Whereunto his Lordſhip inclined, and to that end ſent thither Sir William Godolphin.

The Spaniards ſue for Peace.

(324) Vnto whom D' Aquila ſignified, that hee had found the Lord Deputy, though his eager enemy, yet an honourable perſon; the Iriſh of no valor, rude and vnciuill, yea, and (that which hee ſore feared) perfidious and falſe: That he was ſent from the King of Spaine his Maſter to ayde two Earles, and now hee much doubted whether there were any ſuch in Rerum natura, conſidering that one tempeſtuous puffe of warre had blowne the one of them into Spaine, and the other into the North, ſo as they were no more to be ſeene: willing therefore he was to treat about a Peace, that might be good for the Engliſh, and not hurtfull to the Spaniards; albeit hee wanted nothing requiſit to the holding out of the Siege, and expected enery day out of Spaine freſh ſupplies to find the Engliſh worke and trouble enough.

(325) The matter thus propoſed, and the Engliſh weake and weary through a long Winters ſiege, the Lord Deputy conſented to an agreement, the Articles whereof were theſe:

Iohn Stow.

Concluſions of Peace.

January 2.

1 That Iohn D' Aquila ſhould quit the places which hee held in the Kingdome of Ireland, aſwell in the Towne of Kinſale, as the Forts and Caſtle of Baltimore, Berehauen, and Caſtle-hauen, and ſhould deliuer them vnto the Lord Deputy, or to whom he ſhould appoint.

2 That Don D' Aquila and his Spaniards ſhould depart with Armes, Money, Munition, and Banners diſplayed; the Souldiers notwithſtanding to beare no Armes againſt the Queene of England, till ſuch time as they were vnſhipped in ſome part of Spaine.

3 That Ships and Victuals ſhould be granted vnto them in their departure, for their Money, and at ſuch reaſonable prizes as the Countrey could affoord.

4 That if contrary winds inforced them into any other Port of Ireland, or elſe into England, they might be intreated as friends, with ſafety of harbour, and prouiſions neceſſary for their money to further their departure.

5 That a ceſſation ſhould bee from warre, a ſecurity from iniuries, and victuall granted at reaſonable rates, whiles they remained in preparing for Spaine.

6 That the Ships in which they ſhould be imbarked, might freely paſſe by other Engliſh Ships without moleſtation; and the Ships arriued in Spaine, might ſafely returne backe without any impeachment of the Spaniards: for ſecurity whereof, the ſaid D' Aquila ſhould deliuer for hoſtages ſuch three of their Captaines as the Lord Deputy would chuſe. Vnto theſe Articles Don Iohn ſolemnely ſwore, on the behalfe of the Catholike King his Maſter, and with his hand ſubſcribed his name, Don Iohn D' Aquila.

(326) The troubleſome cloude of moſt likely dangers, thus diſſolued in Mounſters faire Ayre, the Coaſts of Ireland were ſhortly cleared of thoſe forrain intruders, who notwithſtanding their former great bragges, with ſhame and diſhonour embarked themſelues for home, their Companies being much empayred, and proud ſpirits brought down. And now the Ben-hadad Tir-Oen, who had boaſted all Ireland was his, with fearefull flights and by-wayes recouered his lurking holes in Vlſter; after hee had loſt moſt of his men, whom the ſwelling and violently-running Riuers, by reaſon of Winter floods, had ſwallowed vp where his Traytors head, burdened with the dreads of his owne deſerts, could take no reſt, no, not ſo much as to breathe without feare, diſtruſting euery ſhadow that he ſaw, and ſhifting out of one by-corner, before hee well knew where to finde another.

The guilt and feares of Tir-Oen.

(327) Meane-whiles, the Lord Deputy refreſhed his weary and winter-beaten Souldiers, repayred the decayes, and renewed the Garriſons in Mounſter; which done, hee departed for Dublin, where wearing out the winter ſtormes, towards the Spring, by a gentle and eaſie march, well appointed, hee returned into Vlſter, meaning to belay the Rebell on euery ſide, by planting his Forts, ſo to take him in his toyle. Thus being approached vnto Blacke-water, hee tranſported his Army ouer the Foord vpon floates, vpon whoſe banke, beneath the old Fort, hee erected a * new, to ſuch terror of the Arch-Rebell, as hee ſet on fire his owne Houſe at Dunganon, and got himſelfe further from danger; whither the Lord Deputy immediately marched, and made ſpoyle without any ſpare; the Corne fields were deſtroyed, the Villages fired, and booties brought in on euery ſide. The Forts in Logh, Crew, Lough Reogh, and Mogher Lecowd, were yeelded vp, and Garriſons placed in Lough Eaugh, or Sydney, and in Monaghan, whence with their continuall ſallies, they ſo croſſed the enemies, that ſeeing themſelues inuironed about, and no way open for eſcape, like wild Beaſts they hid their heads in the thickets, Forreſts, and Woods, muttering complaints againſt their late magnified Tir-Oen; exclaiming he had engaged the ruine of the whole Nation, for his owne priuate diſcontents, and that theſe warres, howſoeuer beneficiall to him, yet were they moſt pernicious vnto them; whereupon changing their minds with their fortunes, began a-vie, who ſhould be firſt in ſhewing their alteration, by comming in to the Deputy.

Great ſpoyles made in Vlſter.

The Rebels exclaime againſt the Arch-Rebell.

(328) The Earle not ignorant how their affections declined, his owne forces ſhaken, and the fidelity of his followers more and more ſuſpected, he once more determined to preuent the worſt, by his ſubmiſſion, which in humble Letters hee ſent to the Queene, wherein with prayers and teares hee craued pardon of his faults: to ſuch an ebbe was the ſwelling tides of his rebellious heart brought. Her Majeſty (whoſe Nature was Mercy) euer diſtaſtiue of blood, gaue the Lord Deputy authority to pardon his life, though hardly drawne to remit his offences, they being ſo many and great: His friends that affected him, and Mac Baron his brother, daily ſollicited the Deputy for his peace, which laſtly, vpon an abſolute promiſe, to put his life and reuenewes, without any condition, to the will of the Queene, was granted; and at Melliſont, accompanied with two perſons and no more, had acceſſe into the Chamber of Preſence, where the Lord Deputy ſate in a Chayre of Eſtate, moſt of his Marſhalliſts ſtanding about him.

(329) Tir-Oen in baſe and poore array, with a deiected countenance, at the very entrance fell downe vpon his knees, and ſo reſted till hee was commanded to ariſe, and come neerer; when ſtepping forward a few paces, hee fell againe proſtrate, and like a moſt humble Supplicant, in words well couched (as cunning hee was both in ſpeech and action) acknowledged his ſinnes againſt GOD, and fault vnto her Maieſty; and thus began his ſubmiſſion to the Lord Generall:

In the Royall clemency of my dread Soueraigne and moſt gracious Queene, I doe onely lay the hope and reſt of my now remaining eſtate; vnto whoſe pleaſure I abſolutely remit my life, and whole reuenewes; and do moſt ſubmiſſiuely deplore mine owne miſery, beſeeching againe her mercy, whoſe bountifull fauours I haue heretofore, and mighty powers now of late both felt and found; and well-hope, that the fountaine of Her euer-flowing graces are not drawne drie. Let mee (I pray) be the ſubiect, whereon her mercy may worke, and an example for euer of her mild clemency, both to diuulge her Princely lenity, and to redeeme in ſome part the honour I haue loſt. For age I am not ſo vnſeruiceable, nor of body ſo vnable, neither in courage ſo deiected, but that my faithfull ſeruice in her behalfe, may expiate and make ſome meaſure of ſatisfaction, for theſe my many and moſt diſloyall Rebellions. And yet I may iuſtly complaine, that through the malicious enuy of ſome, I haue beene hardly and vnfriendly dealt with, which may ſomewhat extenuate my crime and offence; for----

But as hee was enforcing this point further, the Lord Deputy interrupted his ſpeech, and with a few words deliuered with great authority, (which in a Marſhalliſt ſtands in ſtead of Eloquence) told him, that there was no excuſe to bee heard, heard, his crimes were too great, and thereupon commanded him to depart the Preſence: which he did with a countenance ſeeming very heauy and ſad. The next day departing for Dublin, hee tooke Tir-Oen thither, meaning to tranſport him for England, had not the death of the Queene hindered his deſigne. Theſe things premiſed, and Ireland thus recouered that was in hazard to bee loſt, let vs returne to our Engliſh affaires, from whence theſe Iriſh bogges haue detained vs too long.

(330) On what termes the Earle of Eſſex left Ireland, we haue already heard, and to what lamentable ſucceſſe the height of his riſe brought him, is now to be related; wherein hee may bee the example of Fortunes dalliance, and of the vnſtayed felicity had in this life: a man indeed filled with the affection of his Prince and the People, and fraught with honourable abilities to purchaſe both, vntill by his owne vnaduiſedneſſe (for ſo it muſt needs bee cenſured) hee clouded his honour, wiſedome, and loyalty, with the ſhadowes of his owne diſcontents. Whether his Soueraignes fauours were the wings of his ambitions, or the dependancies of men of Warre, the pillars of his high hopes, I doe not cenſure; but that ſome ſecret vnder-workings gaue fire to his paſſionate diſcontents, I doubt not, hauing ſeene his owne Letters penned in that behalfe. Howſoeuer, ſure it is, the Eye of Ielouſie ſtill attended him, and his doings now laſtly were more noted, then was made ſhew of: for being yet in Ireland with an eminent authority, followed with the flower and chiefeſt men of Warre, and ſuſpected to be too well reſpected by the Arch-Rebell Tir-Oen, it was held good policy (vpon another pretended occaſion) to muſter Forces, and to make a Lord Lieutenant Generall of all England, which was, the Right Honourable Charles Howard, Earle of Nottingham, Lord high Admirall.

(331) The ſhew of this preparation was a preuenting prouidence (as was pretended) againſt a Spaniſh Nauy in new rigging for the Seas; and indeed ſuch preparation in that Summer was made, as the like had not beene in England ſince Queene Elizabeth came to the Crowne. For London was allotted to furniſh ſixteene Ships to the Seas, and ſixe thouſand Souldiers for the Land ſeruice, whereof three thouſand were to reſt euer in a readineſſe, and the other three thouſand (all of them Houſholders) to attend and guard her Maieſties Royall Perſon. And out of many Countries adioyning, ſuch numbers of braue Horſe and Horſemen were gathered, as neuer till then had beene ſeene; the fame whereof was ſo farre ſpred, as neither Spaine, nor any other, could haue any heart to make attempt this way.

(332) But the Earle of Eſſex arriuing in England, not onely peaceably, but alſo very priuately and vnaccompanyed (as hath beene ſaid) and now remaining in the Lord Keepers cuſtody, was often and ſeriouſly dealt with, by that truly Honourable and prouident Statiſt (of whom he was intirely affected) ſomewhat to decline his lofty ſoaring, leſt in mounting too high, hee ſhould melt his waxen wings againſt the hot Sunne, and not to ſuffer the ſore to feſter till it were paſt cure; to which purpoſe alſo hee afterward wrote him a Letter of pithy and ſapient perſwaſions, out of the abundance of his well-wiſhing heart; the Copy whereof wee held worthy to bee heere preſented.

The L. Keeper to the Earle of Essex, Iuly 18. An. 1598.

(333) My very good Lord: It is often ſeen, that a ſtander by ſeeth more then he that playeth the game; and for the moſt part euery man in his owne cauſe, ſtandeth in his owne light, and ſeeth not ſo clearely as hee ſhould. Your Lordſhip hath dealt in other mens cauſes, and in great and weighty affaires with great wiſedome and iudgement; now your owne is in hand, you are not to contemne or refuſe the aduice of any that loueth you, how ſimple ſoeuer. In this order I range my ſelfe; of thoſe that loue you none more ſimple, and none that loueth you with more true and honeſt affection: which ſhall pleade mine excuſe, if you ſhall either miſtake, or miſconſter my words or meaning; but in your Lordſhips honorable wiſdome I neither doubt nor ſuſpect the one or other. I will not preſume to aduiſe you, but I will ſhoot my bolt, and tell you what I thinke. The beginning and too-long continuing of this vnſeaſonable diſcontent you haue ſeene and prooued, by which you may ayme at the end. If you hold ſtill this courſe (which hitherto you finde to be worſe and worſe, and the longer you goe, the farther out of the way) there is little hope or likelyhood that the end will bee better. You are not yet ſo farre gone, but you may well returne; the returne is ſafe, the progreſſe dangerous and deſperate.

In this courſe you hold, if you haue any enemies, you doe that for them which they could neuer doe for themſelues. Your friends you leaue open to ſcorne and contempt; you forſake your ſelfe, and ouerthrow your fortunes, and ruinate your honour and reputation. You giue that courage and comfort to the forraine enemies, as greater they cannot haue. For what can bee more welcome, or more pleaſing newes vnto them, then to heare that her Maieſty and the Realme are maymed of ſo worthy a member, who hath ſo often and ſo valiantly quailed and danted them? You forſake your Countrey, when it hath moſt need of your counſell or helpe. And laſtly, you faile in that indiſſoluble dutie which you owe to your moſt gracious Soueraigne. A dutie impoſed vpon you, not by nature or policy onely, but by that religious and ſacred band, wherein the Diuine Maieſty of Almighty God hath by the rule of Chriſtianitie obliged you.

For the foure firſt, your conſtant reſolution may perhaps moone you to eſteeme them as light: but being well weighed, they are not light, nor lightly to be regarded. And for the two laſt, it may bee that the cleereneſſe of your inward conſcience, may ſeeme to content your ſelfe. But that is not enough; theſe duties ſtand not onely in contemplation, or in inward meditation: their effects be externall action, and when that faileth, the ſubſtance faileth.

This being your preſent ſtate and condition, what is to be done? what is the remedy? My good Lord, I lacke wiſedome and iudgement to aduiſe you; but I will neuer lacke an honeſt true heart to wiſh well, nor (being warranted by a good conſcience) will feare to ſpeake what I thinke.

I haue begun plainly, bee not offended if I proceed ſo. Bene cedit, qui cedit tempori. Seneca ſaith well, Lex ſi nocentem punit, cedendum eſt iuſtitiæ; ſi innocentem, cedendum eſt fortunæ. The medicine and remedy is, not to contend and ſtriue, but humbly to yeeld and ſubmit. Haue you giuen a cauſe, and yet take a ſcandall vnto you? then all you can doe, is too little to make ſatisfaction. Is cauſe of ſcandall giuen vnto you? yet policy, duty, and religion enforce you to ſue, yeeld, and ſubmit to your Soueraigne, betweene whom and you there can bee no proportion of duty. When God requires it as a principall duty and ſeruice to himſelfe; and when it is euident, that great good may enſue of it to your friends, your ſelfe, your Countrey, and your Soueraigne, and extreme harme by the contrary: there can be no diſhonour or hurt to yeeld, but in not doing of it, is diſhonour and impiety.

The difficulty (my good Lord) is to conquer your ſelfe, which is the height of true valour and fortitude; whereunto all your honourable actions haue intended. Doe it in this, and God will bee pleaſed, her Maieſtie (I doubt not) well ſatisfied: your Countrey will take good, and your friends take comfort by it; and your ſelfe (I mention you laſt, for I know that of all theſe, you eſteeme your ſelfe leaſt) ſhall receiue honour, and your enemies (if you haue any) ſhall be diſappointed of their bitter-ſweete hopes.

I haue deliuered what I thinke, ſimply and truly; and leaue you to determine according to your wiſedome. If I haue erred, it is Error amoris, not, Amor Erroris. Conſtrue and accept it (I beſeech you) as I meane it; not as an aduice, but as an opinion, to bee allowed or cancelled at your pleaſure. If I might conueniently haue conferred with your ſelfe in perſon, I would not haue troubled you with ſo many idle blots. What ſoeuer you iudge of this mine opinion, yet be aſſured my deſire is to further all good meanes that may tend to your good, and ſo wiſhing you all honourable happineſſe, I reſt your Lordſhips moſt ready and faithfull, though vnable, poore friend.

The Earles Anſwer.

(334) My very good Lord. Though there is not the man this day liuing, whom I would ſooner make a Iudge of any queſtion that did concerne mee, then your ſelfe: yet you muſt giue mee leaue to tell you, that in ſome caſes I muſt appeale from all earthly Iudges; and if in any, then ſurely in this, when the higheſt Iudge on earth hath impoſed vpon mee the heauieſt puniſhment, without tryall or hearing. Since then I muſt either anſwer your Lordſhips arguments, or forſake mine owne iuſt defence, I will force mine aking head to doe mee ſeruice for an houre.

I muſt firſt deny my diſcouragement, which was forced to be an humorous diſcontentment, and in that it was vnſeaſonable, and is too long continuing, your Lordſhip ſhould rather condole with mee, then expoſtulate. Naturall ſeaſons are expected here below, but violent and vnſeaſonable ſtormes come from aboue: there is no tempeſt to the paſſionate indignation of a Prince, nor that at any time ſo vnſeaſonable, as when it lighteth on thoſe that might expect an harueſt of their their painefull and carefull labours. He that is once wounded, muſt feele ſmart till his hurt is cured, or the part ſenſeleſſe; but cure I expect none, her Maieſties heart being obdurate; and bee without ſenſe I cannot. But then (you ſay) I may ayme at the end. I doe more then ayme, for I ſee an end of all my fortunes, and haue ſet an end to all my deſires. In this courſe doe I any thing for mine enemies? when I was preſent, I found them abſolute, & therfore I had rather they ſhould triumph alone, then haue mee attendant vpon their Chariot. Or doe I leaue my friends? when I was a Courtier, I could yeeld them no fruit of my loue to them; now I am an Heremite, they ſhall beare no enuy for their loue to me. Or doe I forſake my ſelfe; becauſe I doe enioy my ſelfe? Or doe I ouerthrow my fortunes, becauſe I build not a fortune of paper walles, which euery puffe of winde blowes downe? Or do I ruinate mine honour, becauſe I leaue following the purſuit, or wearing the falſe marke of the ſhadow of honour? Doe I giue courage or comfort to the forraine enemies, becauſe I reſerue my ſelfe to encounter them, or becauſe I keepe mine heart from baſeneſſe, though I cannot keepe my fortune from declining? No, no, I giue euery one of theſe conſiderations his due right, and the more I weigh them, the more I finde my ſelfe iuſtified from offending in any of them. As for the two laſt obiections, that I forſake my Countrey when it hath moſt need of mee, and faile in that indiſſoluble duty which I owe to my Soueraigne: I anſwer, that if my Countrey had at this time need of my publike ſeruice, her Maieſty that gouernes it, would not haue driuen me to a priuate life.

I am tyed to my Country by two bands; one publike, to diſcharge carefully, faithfully, & induſtriouſly, that truſt that is committed vnto mee; and the other priuate, to ſacrifice for it my life and carkaſe which haue beene nouriſhed in it. Of the firſt I am free, being diſmiſſed or diſabled by her Maieſty. Of the other, nothing can free mee but death, and therfore no occaſion of performance ſhall offer it ſelfe, but I will meete it halfe way. The indiſſoluble duty which I owe to her Maieſty, is the duty of alleagiance, which I will neuer, nor can faile in; the duty of attendance is no indiſſoluble dutie. I owe her Maieſtie ſeruice of an Earle, and of a Marſhall of England. I haue been contented to doe her the ſeruice of a Clerke, but can neuer ſerue her as a villaine, as a ſlaue. But yet (you ſay) I muſt giue way to time: ſo I doe, for now I ſee the ſtorme come, I haue put my ſelfe into the harbor. Seneca ſaith, We muſt giue way to fortune. I know that fortune is blind and ſtrong; and therefore I goe as farre out of the way as I can. You ſay, The remedy is not to ſtriue. I neither ſtriue nor ſeeke for remedy, but I muſt yeeld & ſubmit, I can neuer yeeld my ſelfe to be guilty, or this impoſition lately laid vpon mee, to be iuſt: I owe ſo much to the Author of truth, as I can neuer yeeld truth to be falſhood, or falſhood to be truth. Haue I giuen cauſe (you aske) and take a ſcandall? No, I gaue not cauſe to take vp ſo much as Fimbrius his complaint, for I did totum telum corpore accipere. I patiently beare all, and ſenſibly feele all that I then receiued. When this ſcandall was giuen mee, nay when the vileſt of all indignities are done vnto mee, doth Religion inforce mee to ſerue? doth God require it? is it impiety not to do it? Why? cannot Princes erre? cannot ſubiects receiue wrong? is an earthly power or authority infinite? Pardon mee, pardon me, my Lord, I can neuer ſubſcribe to theſe principles: but Salomons foole laughes when he is ſtricken: Let theſe that meane to make their profit by Princes faults, ſhew to haue no feare of Princes iniuries. Let them acknowledge an infinite abſoluteneſſe in earth, that doe not beleeue in an abſolute infiniteneſſe in heauen. As for mee, I haue receiued wrong, I feele it, my cauſe is good, I know it, and whatſoeuer come, all the powers on earth can neuer ſhew more ſtrength and conſtancy in oppreſſing, then I can ſhew in ſuffering, whatſoeuer ſhall be impoſed vpon mee.

Your Lordſhip in the beginning of your Letter made your ſelfe a looker on, and mee a player of mine owne game; ſo you may ſee more then I: but you muſt giue mee leaue to tell you in the end of mine, that ſince you but ſee and I ſuffer; I muſt of neceſſity feele more then you. I muſt craue your Lordſhips patience, to giue him that hath a crabbed fortune, leaue to vſe a crabbed ſtyle: But whatſoeuer my ſtyle is, there is no heart more humble, nor more affected toward your Lordſhip, then that of your Lordſhips poore friend,

R. ESSEX.

(335) The diſtempered humour diſcouering it ſelfe in this Letter, argueth both the depth of his ſettled diſcontent; and the danger of giuing way to violent paſſions, which not onely depriue the wiſeſt of the vſe of their owne vnderſtanding, but alſo blind their eyes that they cannot ſee, nor apprehend the benefit of other mens faithfull counſels. Notwithſtanding, it pleaſed her gracious Highneſſe (whom hee ſo cenſureth as wronging him, for lending a more attentiue eare to his enemies ſuggeſtions, then to his owne ſatisfactions) firſt, to remit his durance to his owne houſe, and then loth to looke into his faults, but with her Princely eye of fauour to proceed vnto ſome moderate cenſure of his actions, to the end he might ſee his owne errors, and ſhee ſo limit his power, as her owne might be ſecured.

(336) To which end ſhee aſſigned certaine of her Priuy Councell to conuent him concerning the breaking of his former inſtructions for the North-Iriſh proſecution, and the manner of his treating with Tir-Oen, his comming from Ireland, and leauing that Kingdome contrary to her Maieſties expreſſe commandement, ſigned vnder her Royall Hand and Signet. Whereunto his anſwer was, That the ſtate of Warre held it a Maxime, to make good the Stand before the Remooue, and that it was one thing at Table to direct, but another thing in field to effect, eſpecially in Ireland, whoſe Warre was with Bogges and Woods, aſwell as with Men. And to the reſt of the obiections hee anſwered with ſuch obedient diſcretion, and loyall ſubmiſſion, as hee well ſatisfied the Honourable Preſence, onely a ſuſpenſion from the exerciſe of ſome of his Offices was decreed, vntill her Maieſties pleaſure ſhould otherwiſe order it. Shortly after he was ſet at full liberty; the Queene ſending him word, that ſhee well hoped his ſureſt guard would now be his owne diſcretion.

Eſſex ſuſpended from the exerciſe of his Office.

(337) But ſeeing his wonted Greatneſſe reſtrained, though the ſcope of his liberty was thus farre enlarged, hee preſently mounted higher with the wings of diſcontent: for depriued of Offices, neglected in Court, and all his forraine ſeruices powred into her Maieſties lap, was now (as hee imagined) there wrapped vp, and laid in obliuion. Neither were theſe his grieuances leſſened by his military followers, who daily watred theſe ill ſet plants with their exaſperated complaints, till they were ſprung to ſome height; and ſtill to nouriſh their ſap, many proiects were caſt, and conferences held how to lop off other branches, which as they feared would hinder their growth; till laſtly, at Drury Houſe they agreed on the manner (O had it withered before it had bloomed, or dyed in the graffing, before it tooke ſappe) which was, by violent hand to bring the Earle into her Maieſties preſence, and to remooue from her ſuch as they deemed his oppoſites.

(338) The frequent aſſembly vnto Eſſex houſe by Noblemen, Knights, Captaines, and others, was preſently obſerued by the Statiſts in Court; to ſtop the current of which confluence before it grew to a flood, Secretary Herbert was ſent from her Maieſty to require him to repayre before the Lords of her Councell, then aſſembled at Salisbury Court: which he excuſing with ſickneſſe, neglected to doe, and the ſame night vpon ſome ſiniſter reports ſet a double watch about him, pretending ſome danger to bee meant to his perſon. For whoſe defence the next morning (being Sunday) many repayred vnto his houſe, among whom, as chiefe were the Earles of Rutland and Southampton, the Lord Sands and Monteagle, accompanied with a Troupe of gallant Gentlemen their followers. Febr. 2.

(339) Her Maieſty hearing of theſe diſorderly proceedings, in her Princely wiſedome thought to caſt water vpon this begun fire, before it brake forth into flame, and thereupon ſent foure men of much honour vnto his place, to offer him iuſtice for any griefes, and to command the aſſembly to depart. The perſons ſent, were the Lord Keeper of the Great Seale, the Earle of Worceſter, Sir Francis Knowles his vncle, and the Lord Chiefe Iuſtice of England; all of them in high honour and fauour with the Earle himſelfe.

(340) Theſe comming to his houſe without Temple-Barre, were receiued in themſelues, but ſcarce any of their ſeruants ſuffered to follow, excepting the Bearer of the Purſe and Seale, where finding the Court full of thoſe his followers, the Lord Keeper putting off his Hat, told them, That they were ſent by her Maieſty to vnderſtand the cauſe of this their aſſembly, and to let them know, that if they had any particular cauſe of griefe againſt any perſon whatſoeuer, they ſhould haue hearing and Iuſtice. The Earle of Eſſex anſwered, That his life was ſought after, and that he had beene perfidiouſly dealt withall. To which the Lord Chiefe Iuſtice replyed, That if any ſuch matter was attempted, it was fit for him to declare it, aſſuring him of a faithfull relation, and that her Maieſty would doe him Iuſtice. Which promiſes the Lord Keeper ſeconded, and deſired the Earle to declare his griefes, if not openly, yet in priuate, and hee doubted not but but to procure him full ſatisfaction; and then turning towards the multitude, with a louder voyce, ſaid, I doe command you all vpon your alleageance, to lay downe your Weapons, and to depart. Whereupon the Earle himſelfe went into his Booke-chamber, theſe foure Councellors following him in hope of priuate conference; but ſo farre off was hee from hearing them further, or anſwering to their demands, that leauing them there vnder ſure cuſtody, he returned to his other attendants.

An. Dom. 1600. Sunday, Febr. 8. Eſſex entreth into London.

(341) With whom in tumultuous manner, hee made into London, his followers crying, that the Earle of Eſſex ſhould haue been murthered by Cobham, Cecill, and Rawley; all men amazed what this did meane. Thus paſt hee from Ludgate thorow Cheapeſide, into Fanchurch-ſtreet, where hee entred the houſe of a * ſuppoſed friend (then one of the Sheriffes) who ſeeing the multitude, auoyded himſelfe out at a backe-doore, when preſently in diuers parts of the City Eſſex was proclaimed a Traitor, to the no leſſe griefe of the Citizens, then feares of his followers; and thence returning with a Halbert in his hand, and a table-napkin about his necke, came into Gracious-ſtreet, where a while hee made his ſtand, (the Lord Major and others beeing aſſembled at the vpper end towards Leaden-Hall) no one Citizen or ſeruant ſhewing him any ſigne of aſſiſtance. The caſe ſo deſperate, one of the principall offenders contriued how by redeeming his fault, to ſaue his owne life; who haſtening into the Strand to Eſſex houſe, and comming to Sir Iohn Dauis, as being ſent from the Earle, gat releaſe of the foure Councellors, vnder whoſe guard they had beene hitherto kept.

* Thom. Smith.

(342) Eſſex now deſpairing of all ſuccours in London, ſaw it was booteleſſe there to make his aboade, and therefore retired againe towards Pauls; meaning to paſſe Ludgate the way that hee came, but being reſiſted by a company of Pikemen, and other forces, made by that ſtout and noble Prelate, the then Lord Biſhop of London, hee was put backe, Sir Chriſtopher Blunt ſore hurt, and young Tracy ſlaine; beſides ſome others on the Queenes part, himſelfe narrowly eſcaping, being thruſt thorow the Hat with a Pike. So hence againe returning, at Queene-Hithe he tooke Boat, bidding the City and his fortunes adue.

He returneth, and is forced from Ludgate.

(343) His enterprize thus fruſtrate, with a minde diſtracted, he rowed vp the Riuer, and landed at the Water-gate of his owne houſe, which he preſently fortified; and the Lord Admirall aſſaulted, ſuffering notwithſtanding the Counteſſe of Eſſex, the Lady Rich, and their Gentlewomen to depart; which done, he forced the Garden euen to the walles of the houſe. Some reſiſtance was made, and ſome perſons ſlaine vpon either part, which the Earle perceiuing, preſently yeelded, deſiring onely that he might be ciuilly vſed, and that hee might haue an honourable tryall; and ſo beeing firſt brought to Lambeth Houſe, where an houre or two he remained with the Lord Archbiſhop (his euer moſt louing, but then moſt mournefull friend) was thence with ſome other Lords and Gentlemen conuayed by water to the Tower, about ten of the clocke the ſame night: hauing then experience, that vaine is the loue of the Commons to a Subiect (how great ſoeuer) when it is counter-ballanced with the dutifull obedience vnto their Prince.

Taketh boate and fortifieth his houſe in Strand.

(344) Vpon the nineteenth of the ſame moneth, the Earle of Eſſex and Southhampton were arraigned at Weſtminſter, the Lord Buckhurſt Lord high Treaſurer of England, being made Lord Steward for the day, where the great reſolution of the one contemning death, and the ſweet temper of the other well deſeruing life, did breed moſt compaſſionate affections in all men, hearing the ſentence of Law to paſſe vpon them. The one of them remained priſoner in the Tower during the Raigne of the Queene, & by the gracious clemency of our Soueraigne Lord K. Iames at his comming to the Crowne, had pardon of life, and reſtauration of blood, the other (Eſſex) the fiue and twentieth of February, being Aſhwedneſday, ſuffred vpon the Greene within the Tower, rendring his ſoule to God with a moſt penitent and Chriſtian conſtancy, whoſe laſt ſpeeches were to this effect:

Eſſex arraigned and condemned.

(346) And then kneeling downe, ſaid, I haue been diuers times in places of danger, where death was neither ſo preſent nor ſo certaine, and yet euen then I felt the weakeneſſe of my fleſh, and therefore now in this laſt and great conflict, I deſire Gods aſſiſtance by his preſeruing Spirit. And ſo with * a moſt heauenly prayer, and faithfull conſtancy, (as if his ſoule were then already in heauenly fruition) he humbled himſelfe to the blocke, and ſpreading abroad his armes (the ſigne that hee had giuen to his Headſ-man) his head was with three ſtrokes of the Axe ſeuered from his body, the great heauineſſe of all men, appearing as well by their countenances, as ſpleene againſt his Executioner, who was in danger of his life at his returne, had not the Sheriffes aſſiſted him to his home.

* See this his prayer and other his ſpeeches at large in Stowes Annals, page 1406.

(347) For acceſſaries and chiefe Councellors in this offence, dyed at Tyborn, Sir Gilliam Merricke Knight, and Henry Cuffe (for his exquiſite learning much bewayled of all men) and fiue daies after them, vpon the Scaffold on Tower Hill, were beheaded Sir Charles Dauers, and Sir Chriſtopher Blunt Knights. And before any of theſe, Thomas Lee a Captaine was executed, for words ſpoken touching the Earle of Eſſex his deliuerance, to mooue, or rather to inforce the Queene thereunto, as his words were conſtrued, who neuertheleſſe confidently tooke his death, that he neuer had thought of any violent attempt.

Others executed.

(348) As the death of this Nobleman was much lamented by the Subiects, whoſe loue towards him was ſo ingrafted, as I thinke, I may well ſay, neuer ſubiect had more) ſo her Maieſty likewiſe hauing ſuch a Starre falne from her firmament, was inwardly mooued, and outwardly oftentimes would ſhew paſſions of her griefe, euen till the time of her approaching end, when two yeeres after ſhee laid downe her Head in the Graue, as the moſt reſplendent Sunne ſetteth at laſt in a Weſterne cloud.

The griefe conceiued for the Earle of Eſſex his death.

(349) The ſtate of which Great Queene throughout the whole courſe of her moſt flouriſhing Raigne, was (as in part you haue ſeene ſhadowed already) ſo beautified and ſtrengthened with all honourable perfections, both of Peace and Warre, as neuer any Monarch raigned with greater obſeruance of her owne, nor ruled with a more obſerued magnanimity toward forraine Nations: inſomuch, as if her incomparable vertues & praiſes were truly and exactly deſcribed (a worke worthy ſome noble ſpirit and Pen) we are verily perſwaded, that future ages wil ſomwhat ſtagger & doubt, whether ſuch celebration of her, were not rather affectionately Poeticall, then faithfully Hiſtoricall.

A brief ſhadow of Queene Elizabeths due praiſes.

(350) For, the great affaires of Europe mainely depended vpon her directions, who ſitting at the Helme of the Ship (as Fronto ſpake of Antoninus the Emperour) arbitrated and guided their eſtates both in peace and warre: Spaine, ſeeking to ouerflow all, was beaten backe, and ſcarcely able to maintaine her owne bankes: In France, the houſe of Valoys vnder-propped by her counſell; that of Bourbons, aduanced by her countenance, forces, and treaſure; Scotland releeued by her loue; Netherlands by her power; Portingals King by her bounty; Poland by her commiſeration; likewiſe Germany, Denmarke, Sueueland, often tooke vp and laid downe Armes at her becke and diſpoſe. Neither could the vtmoſt bounds of Europe, (the Ruſſians and Tartars) containe the limits and extent of her great fame; but that the ſame pierced further into the remoter parts of Aſia, Africa, America, among the Turkes (whoſe great Emperour, in honour of ſo great a Mediatreſſe, granted peace vnto the Polonians outworne with warres,) among the Perſians

Her ſway and eſtimation in forraine Countries.

Perſians, Barbarians, Indians, and where not? In moſt of whoſe Dominions to the great enriching of her Kingdome, ſhe ſettled commerce for encreaſe of merchandize, and got large priuiledges for encouragement of her Merchants, whom ſhe cheriſhed as a moſt neceſſary and important part of her Weale-Publike.

Her Princely qualities.

(351) Who, for her Royall actions and Princely qualities of Minde (ſeated alſo in ſuch a Body as for ſtate, ſtature, beauty, and Majeſty, beſt befitted an Empreſſe,) may be ſingled out for an Idea of an abſolute Prince, her Sex onely excepted, which yet made her vertues more remarkeable, as being (and ſo reputed by Strangers) of all the Princes of her time, the moſt exact obſeruer (both for Action and Ceremony,) of true Regall deportment and magnificence. For her enterprizes as fortunate as Cæſar; for life, loue, wiſdom, and magnanimity, another Auguſtus; by her peaceable raigne ſhutting the Temple of Warre in England (whiles all Nations round about her felt the miſeries of war) as hee did the doores of Ianus in Rome.

Her Military prouidence.

And yet had ſhee Warriers like vnto the Worthies of Dauid; her forraine imployments, Nauigations, and diſcoueries, hauing bred ſuch numbers of moſt renowned Captaines, both for Sea and Land, as none of our former Princes haue ſeene the like. With which neceſſary kind of noble Seruitors, that her owne Kingdome might bee alwayes munified (as foreſeeing the vncertainties and ſudden changes in the Peace-pretending amities of forraine Princes,) ſhee euer imployed many of her Gentry and others, in the warres of Princes abroad, ſo to perfect them for all occurrents of their Countrey at home; which alſo induced her (ſome Statiſts haue thought) to ſuffer that long-lingring protraction of her Iriſh warres, the rather, to keepe in vre and exerciſe, the skill and valour of her Engliſh. By which meanes, the ſpreading fame and * extent of her Empire was ſuch, that ſhe might ſeeme a ſecond Traian, who laid the circuit of the Romans the largeſt; hauing not onely ſo powerfull a Nauy ſtill in readineſſe, as whereby ſhee attained the Soueraignty of the Sea, but ſo famous Sea-men alſo, as that, vnder her auſpicious Raigne, * twice was the whole Globe of the Terreſtriall World ſailed round about.

*Virginea made an Engliſh Colonie. 1585. Guiana, &c.

* By Drake and Candiſh.

Her vertues peaceable.

(352) Neither leſſe was her renowne for thoſe other vertues which are the attendants of Peace; her Clemency, Iuſtice, and Temperance: touching the laſt of which, as in one kind (of her diet and priuate life,) King Edward her Brother vſually called her, his Lady Temper: ſo of another kind of Temperance in this learnedſt of Queenes, the * learnedſt of Kings hath giuen this memorable teſtimony, that when as France (part of her Royall Title) was in ciuill warres, Spaine (her mortall Enemy) enfeebled both in power and purſe, Netherland ambitious of her gouernment, and Scotland ruled by an Infant, yet in ſuch abundance both of meanes, opportunities, and prouocations, ſo ſuperabundant was her moderation and temper, that ſhee euer religiouſly abſtained from all ambitious deſire of encrochment on the rights or territories of any her neighbour Princes. Being in this, and thoſe other her vertuous actions, ſuch, as of whom that which was ſpoken of Antonius Pius, may more truly be verified, that ſcarcely, in youth ſhee did any thing raſhly, or in her age indiſcreetly; ſcarcely, I ſay: for as a Creature, wee cannot exempt her from all frailties, as a Woman, from paſſions, or as a Prince, from all errors, wherinto, euen againſt her owne naturall inclination, ſhee might be drawne, either on miſinformation, or on opinion of neceſſity in the State. For her Court, it was not onely a frequent Academie, of as honourable Councellers, Illuſtrious Peeres, Gallant Courtiers, Learned Profeſſors, Intelligent Statiſts, as euer attended any Chriſtian Prince, but alſo a Nurſery, where young Nobles and others might be trained vp to the managing of greateſt affaires, and a Sanctuary where the meaneſt might find reliefe againſt the mightieſt; becauſe as the Wiſeſt in her Councell were content to learne wiſdome from her directions, ſo the Greateſt were drawne to practiſe Equity, both by her Example and Command. Yea, which is more admirable in her Sex, ſo reſerued was ſhee from giuing any man too-much intereſt, or being led and ouerſwaied by any of her Great-ones about her, that they all ſtood in a reuerent awe of her very preſence and aſpect; but much more of her leaſt frowne or checke, wherewith ſome of them, who thought they might preſume beſt of her fauour, haue been ſo ſuddenly daunted & Planet-ſtricken, that they could not lay downe their griefe thereof, but in their graues. A thing ſo much the ſtranger, conſidering otherwiſe her incōparable meekneſſe, and gracious countenance and demeanours meanours towards her people, who neuer ſatiated with her ſight and preſence, were no otherwiſe affected with ioy and wondering thereat, (though they beheld her neuer ſo often) then if they had beheld ſome Angelicall Creature.

Her Learning.

(353) Theſe Soueraigne Arts of Majeſticall rule, were maruellouſly poliſhed and perfected by her exquiſite learning, and inſight in the Arts liberall: for which if the Emperour Hadrian bee ſo highly commended, much more muſt this learned Empreſſe, who further to perfect her ſolid knowledge, read euery Authour in his owne Originall, and anſwered moſt Nations Ambaſſadours in their owne languages. Yea, ſo farre was ſhee deuoted to learning and the profeſſors thereof, that in honour of it and them, ſhee purpoſely went to the Vniuerſity of Oxford twice, and once to Cambridge, at each time there ſpending many whole dayes together, at the Academicall Exerciſes, and diſputations of their chiefeſt learned men in all faculties. In both which noble Academies, ſhee left not onely the deare remembrances of her gracious loue, deliuered to them publikely in her Princely and Eloquent Orations, but much more teſtified in her Princely bounty, by enacting a Law for the doubling (almoſt) of the yeerely reuenewes of all their noble foundations. Thus ſpent ſhee her time and cares in cheriſhing wiſdome in others, and like Sabaes Queen ſeeking to increaſe it in her ſelfe, eſteeming a day ſpent otherwiſe (as Titus was wont to ſay of himſelfe) quite loſt. For which purpoſe euery day all other affaires laid aſide, ſhee ſet apart ſome houres, either to read, or heare her learned Readers; one of which number, (a * man of excellent learning) profeſſed, that her Inſtructers, as oft as they came to her preſence about ſuch employments, receiued ſuch admirable documents from her, that they ſeemed rather to learne of her, then to bring learning to her; and that the learnedſt Authors, as Diuine Plato, and the like, were made more diuine by the learned Commentaries which ſhee wrote vpon them. In which reſpects, both of noble actions and arts, well may ſhee bee paralelled with that euer-renowned Zenobia, who hauing both perfectly read the Roman Story in Greeke, and alſo her ſelfe abridged the Alexandrian, and all the Orientall hiſtory, thereby attained to ſo high a pitch of wiſdome and authority, that ſhee not onely inſulted vpon the Romans, but held the Arabians, Sarazens, Armenians, and other fierce and intractable people in ſuch obedience, that they neuer durſt ſtirre againſt her.

(354) But amongſt her volumes (which were very many and choiſeſt) the Booke of God was firſt in her eſteeme, nor laſt in her readings; the pious fruites whereof ſhined brightly throughout the whole courſe aſwell of her priuate life, as publike actions. In her Priuate; Piety, Sobriety, Purity, Charity, and Chaſtity (maugre the venemous tongues of all Hel-borne Slanderers) were her vnſeparable Companions, neuer ſuffering any Lady to approach her ſacred preſence, of whoſe ſtaine ſhee had but the leaſt ſuſpition. For the Publike, the diſtreſſed ſhee releeued, the oppreſſed ſhe ſuccoured, the ouer-borne Princes ſhee aided, the proud ſhee amated, and alwayes ouermaſtred to her laſting memory, and Englands glory. But moſt eſpecially ſhined her zeale to God (on whoſe onely Prouidence and reflexe of her owne vnſtained Conſcience, ſhee repoſed againſt all affronts of the world) in preſeruing his true Church and worſhip, both from the pollutions of Idolatry, and frenzies of Noueliſts; her Kingdome being a receptacle, and Court a Sanctuary for the baniſhed Proteſtants, as was the Palace of Conſtantius (the huſband of our Helena) for the perſecuted Chriſtians, when he ſate Emperour of the Weſt in this Iland of Britaine. Whereby as in her life time ſhe attained to be * ſtyled by forraine Churches; ſo at her death was ſhee by them generally lamented, as the Nurſing Mother of the French, Dutch, Italian, Exiles for Chriſts name, and the vnconquered Defendreſſe of the whole true Chriſtian Religion.

Her ſickneſſe was accompanied with a deepe melancholy, wherein, as ſhee gaue ſignes of death vnto the learned Phyſicians, ſo great aſſurance of her eternall life, vnto all the worthy Prelates employed about her: manifeſting (euen when ſilence oppreſſed her tongue) by liuely ſignes at their prayers and ſpeeches, how ſhee reioyced with the

An. Dom. 1602.

BEfore the conceiued sorrowes, for the death of the late renowned Queene could fully bee dissolued into teares, or those get passage from the heart to the eyes, the conduit was stopped with a sudden ioy, and all faces cleared, before that sad pensiuenesse had therein set her full print. The state of England standing that day, like vnto that of Iudah, wherein the foundation of the second Temple was laid, whoſe ancient men mourned, as doubting, the glory thereof could not be anſwerable to that of Salomons; but as they were comforted by a Prophet from GOD, That the glory of the later ſhould ſurmount the former, ſo all Engliſh hearts by a diuine bleſſing from GOD, were preſently cheered, when they ſaw their Morning Starre ariſe in the North, whoſe Pole with His attractiue Power, long before had drawne the Needle of the Southerne Compaſſe vnto that One point.

Hag. 2.4. The ioy of the Engliſh for the Scottiſh Kings entrance.

(2) Immediately vpon the death of the Queene, the Lords of the Land gaue full ſatisfaction vnto the people, in proclaiming IAMES the Sixt, King of Scotland, by the name of Iames the Firſt, King of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. to the vnſpeakeable comfort of all true Engliſh, as well for his vnqueſtionable claime, as for that hee profeſſed the ſame true Religion (whoſe preſeruation was their tender care) as alſo for his ſingular learning and experience, whereby hee was accompliſhed to vndergoe the managing of ſo great an Empire, hauing now attained to thirty ſixe yeeres, nine moneths, and fiue dayes, exerciſed altogether in the practice of Kingly gouernment, from the very firſt dayes of his infancy.

King Iames proclaimed.

King Iames his iuſt Title to the Crowne of England.

(3) That his Title was moſt iuſt, no man can deny, being ſprung from the vnited Roſes of Lancaſter and Yorke, King Henry the ſeuenth, and Queene Elizabeth his Wife: whoſe Iſſue by the Male, failing in the late deceaſed Queene Elizabeth of glorious memory, the Offſpring of Margaret their eldeſt daughter, was the next Heire, which Lady married vnto Iames, the fourth King of Scotland; by him had Iſſue King Iames the fifth, whoſe onely Daughter Queene Mary, was Mother of this our mighty Monarch. Let Doleman therefore dote vpon his owne dreames, and other like Traytors faſhion their barres vpon the Popes forge; yet hath God and his right, ſet him on the Throne of his moſt lawfull inheritance, ſo to vnite the two Crownes into one: Gods omnipotent arme bringing at laſt that to paſſe, which had often beene aſſayed, but could not be effected by any power of man. For, did not Edward our firſt, the terror of Syria, and Edward the ſixt, our godly Ioſias, both of them diſtreſſe Scotland with their warres, onely to haue made an vnion by the marriages of their next Heires? But the time being not come, and all other preceding Princes failing of their purpoſes, the peaceable Vnion of thoſe two Kingdomes, England and Scotland, as alſo of two other, France and Ireland, was reſerued for Him, who is a patterne of all Princely Learning and Piety, vnto all other Monarchs vpon the ſurface of the Earth.

King Iames appointed by God to vnite the two Kingdomes.

(4) But theſe calme proceedings without any oppugnancy, as they were moſt ioyfull to the Engliſh, ſo were they admirable vnto other forraine Nations, yea, and enuied at of ſome, eſpecially ſuch as hoped for an alteration, or at leaſt-wiſe a toleration of Religion. And ſo much the rather, for that Pope Clement the eighth had ſent the yeere before vnto Henry Garnet, Superior of the Ieſuites in England, two Bulls to the contrary; one to the Clergy, and the other to the Laity. The Title of the former was, Dilectis filijs Archipresbytero, & reliquo clero Anglicano, &c. the later, Dilectis filijs, Principibus, & Nobilibus, Catholicis Anglicanis, ſalutem & Apoſtolicam Benedictionem: the ſum of both, thus: To our beloued ſons, the Arch-Prieſt and the Clergy, the Peeres and Nobles, Catholikes of England, greeting, and Apoſtolicall Benediction, &c. The tenour was, that after the death of her Maieſty, whether by courſe of Nature, or otherwiſe: Whoſoeuer ſhould lay claime or title to the Crowne of England, though neuer ſo directly, & neerely intereſſed by diſcent, ſhould not bee admitted vnto the Throne; vnleſſe he would firſt tolerate the Romiſh Religion, & by all his beſt endeauours promote the Catholike cauſe; vnto which, by a ſolemne and ſacred Oath, hee ſhould religiouſly ſubſcribe, after the death of that Miſerable Woman: for ſo it pleaſed his Holineſſe to tearme Elizabeth, that moſt great & happy Queen. By vertue of which Buls, (if vertue may bee in any ſuch vicious Libels) the Ieſuites diſſwaded the Romiſh-minded Subiects from yeelding (in any wiſe) obedience vnto King Iames, as being not an obedient Catholike ſonne; but this not working to their wiſhed effect, and Hee now ſolemnly proclaimed with an vniuerſall applauſe, loue, and peace, their hopes began to grow cold, and no ſuccours from Spaine being now to be expected, Garnet, the Superiour, to auoid further dangers, ſacrificed theſe hunger-ſtarued Buls to Vulcan the fiery god.

The Romaniſts hopes for a toleration in Religion.

An. Dom. 1603. King Iames commeth to London.

(5) King Iames in Scotland, receiuing intelligence of the moſt plauſible paſſages to this enlargement of his Style and Domi-

Dominions, prepared himſelfe hitherward, and vpon the ſixt of Aprill came to Barwicke, thence to Wytherington, Newcaſtle, Durham, Yorke, Dancaſter, Newarke, Burleigh, Roiſton, Theobalds, and thence to London vpon the ſeuenth of May. In all which places hee was moſt royally and ioyouſly receiued, with all demonſtrations of trueſt loyalty, loue, and obedience, which was no leſſe benignely accepted of by his Maieſtie, who the better to manifeſt his royall diſpoſition, in all ſuch places as hee came, where Gaoles for offenders were kept, out of his clemency moſt graciouſly ſet free the Priſoners, (thoſe onely excepted, who lay for treaſon, murther, or Romiſh diſloyalty) disburſing alſo large ſummes of money for releaſe of many others from their creditors.

His Progreſſe and places of entertainment.

His Mercy extended to the Priſoners.

(6) In all which progreſſe, admirable was the confluence of people, which with haſte to meete him, ſeemed rather to flie then to runne, and ſuch were their ſhoutes of ioy, that the hils reſounded the Eccho thereof, euen vp to the Heauens, which had beene ſo propitious, as to beſtow on them ſo good a King, which moſt abundantly appeared the day that his Maieſtie remooued from Theobalds to London, when at Stanford-hill, neere vnto Totnam high-Croſſe in Middleſex, the City of London (repreſented in the L. Major, the Aldermen, with fiue hundred choyce Citizens, all in Chaines of Gold, and very well mounted) met his Maieſty, and with all ſolemne obſeruance attended Him vnto the Charter-Houſe neere Smithfield, which was moſt ſumptuouſly furniſhed for his royall entertainement. On which very day, a Proclamation came forth againſt all griping Monopolies that hindred commerce, and Protections that ſtopped the due proceedings of Law, as alſo againſt other abuſes in other inferiour carriages. All which were ſo acceptable to the People and Common-wealth, (which had beene too much eaten-out with ſuch Locuſts and Caterpillers) as neuer any King wanne himſelfe more loue: theſe being accepted as the auſpicious beginnings, promiſing moſt happy ſequels. So that His entrance was as another Conſtantine, whoſe perſon euery man praied for, and deſired to ſee: and for Peace, another Octauius, hauing ruled peaceably a ſtout ſtirring Nation, euen from his younger yeeres, and liued in peace with all the Princes and Kings of the Earth: in which peace now laſtly he brought the Crown and Kingdome of Scotland to augment the glory, circuit and ſtrength of this Realme of England, in whoſe vnited body, as a faire branched Tree, euen at the firſt hee beganne to engraft the Syens of his Princely vertues, which by the ſappe and Sunne-ſhine of his iuſt gouernement ſtill ſpred more and more, like vnto the Cedars that grow vpon Lebanon.

The ioy that was conceiued at the ſight of his Maieſty.

His Maieſties comming to London.

His Maieſties firſt proceedings to maintaine law and commerce.

(7) The Engliſh Empire thus peaceably eſtabliſhed, both by, and vnto this peaceable Monarch: from ſundry forraine Princes were ſent Ambaſſadors, to congratulate his entrance; as namely, from the Palſgraue of the Rheine, one of the Princes Electors for the Emperour of the Romans: from the French King, Mounſieur de Roſny, Great Treaſurer of France: from the Spaniſh King, Don Iohn de Taſſis: from the States of Holland and Zeland: from the Arch-Duke of Auſtria: from the Signiory of Venice: from the Duke of Florence, and from others.

Diuers Ambaſſadors came into England to congratulate his entrance.

(8) But among all new-commers, none was more admired, nor gazed on, then was Hugh Oneal, Earle of Tir-Oen, that perfidious, (but very valiant) ſubtile, and ſmooth-tongued Traytor, and Boutefeu of Ireland, that had beene the death of many a worthy man: who hauing (as we haue ſhewed) yeelded himſelfe to the Lord Generall Mountioy, in the ſickneſſe of the late Queene, was now by him brought vnto Englands Court, to the Generals great honour, and Tir-Oens great good, if hee could haue had grace to containe himſelfe. For not onely was hee taken vpon his lowly ſubmiſſion into fauour with his dread Soueraigne, and reſtored to his former eſtate and dignity, (a very great fauour to ſo great an Offender) but a Proclamation was alſo made in his behalfe, and for his ſecurity, that hee ſhould of all men bee honourably vſed, (a grace ſeldome ſhewed a Traytor) becauſe as it ſeemed, his guilty conſcience ſurcharged with blood, feared the hand of euery man that beheld his face; and indeed many Women enraged for loſſe of their Husbands, and Sonnes, furiouſly deſired and aſſayed to quench their hatred with his blood: in which perplexity wee will leaue him for a reſtleſſe Rebell, who laſtly like a fugitiue left againe both his loyalty, and his owne Countrey.

Tir-Oen brought into England, Much gazed at,

And hated.

(9) In the meane while the ſolemnities for the Coronation were prepared, and many ſtately Trophies (no leſſe due to the conſeruation of Peace, then to the atchieuings of Warre) in London ſtreets ſet vp, which by reaſon of the great ſickneſſe in that City then cruelly raging, ſtood a long time rather like the ruines of ſome old decay, then the Princely Pageants of a new Triumph. For before the appointed day of Coronation (which was the twenty fiue of Iuly, being the Feaſt day of Saint Iames the Apoſtle) a Proclamation came forth, that no Londoner ſhould preſume to approach to the Court, the City hauing buried that week aboue a thouſand of the plague. But yet a greater plague to the Land then this, was intended ſome weekes before, had not the prouidence of a good GOD preuented the deſignes of mercileſſe men. For, certaine Italianated Prieſts, boyling in reuengefull rancour (becauſe their plots and hopes, which they vainely promiſed themſelues for aduancement of their Religion) were now paſt all appearance of poſſibility or ſucceſſe, and combining with ſome others of better Ranke and Note, whom priuate diſcontents had whetted on to a publike miſchiefe; contriued together a deſperate deſigne, for ſurprize of the Kings Perſon, and Prince Henry his Sonne. Of forces to effect it, they made no doubt, meaning to retaine them priſoners in the Tower, and with the Treaſures therein to maintaine their intent, or, if the Tower were impugnable, then to carry them to Douer Caſtle, and there by violence either to obtaine their owne pardons, a toleration in Religion, and a remoouall of ſome Councellors of the State, or elſe to put ſome further proiect in execution. To conceale this Treaſon, Watſon the Prieſt deuiſed Oaths for ſecrecy, and himſelfe with Clarke (another Prieſt alſo) taught, that the act was lawfull, being done before the Coronation, for that the King was no King, before hee was Anointed, and the Crowne ſolemnely ſet on his head.

Trophies ſet vp in London ſtood long vnfiniſhed

(10) The other perſons whoſe loyalty was likewiſe called into queſtion, as inuolued in the attempt, were Henry Brooke, Lord Cobham, and Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, Thomas Lord Gray of Wilton, Sir Walter Raughley, Lord Warden of the Stanneries, Sir Griffin Markham, and Sr. Edward Parham Knights, George Brook, and Bartholmew Brooksby Eſquires, and Anthony Copley, a Gentleman; all which parties being apprehended, were committed, ſome to the Gate-Houſe at Weſtminſter, others to the Tower of London. Meane-while (notwithſtanding the raging ſickneſſe) the day for the Coronation (being the Feaſt of Saint Iames) was celebriouſly kept, with all ſolemne performance, and ancient Rites of the Engliſh Kings, in the Collegiate Church of Saint Peter in Weſtminſter. Where, the antique Regall Chaire of Inthronation, did bleſſedly receiue, with the Perſon of his Maieſty, the full accompliſhment alſo of that Propheticall prediction of this His comming to the Crowne, which Antiquity hath recorded to haue beene therein inſcribed thus:

The Coronation of the King and Queene.

For euen there now the ſacred Oyle was powred vpon the Royall Perſons of King Iames and Queene Anne, by the moſt Reuerend Prelate, Iohn Whitgift, Lord Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, the Princeſſe and Peeres wearing their Robes and Coronets, the Officers giuing attendance in their places, and the Lord Major of London in a Gowne of Crimſon Veluet, with the Aldermen in Scarlet: twelue principall Citizens were admitted to attend them, all other forbidden becauſe of the plague.

(11) As the great ſolitude of the City of London, by reaſon of this infection, and the retiredneſſe both of his Maieſty and all his Nobles, gaue ſome hopes to the fore-mentioned Prieſts and their Abettors, for the eaſier accompliſhing their plots: ſo was it alſo ſome occaſion of the delay of Iuſtice on them, after their treaſonous deſignes were now fully brought to light. Wherefore, London continuing ſtill vnfit for ſuch a tryal, and requiſite concourſe of Peeres and people, Wincheſter, the Tearme being there kept, was the place deſigned for their arraignment, whither they were all conueyed vnder ſtrong guard. The firſt who there * came to their tryall, were George Brooke, Brother to the Lord Cobham, Sir Griffith Markham, & Sir Edward Parham, Brooksby, Copley, Watſon, & Clark; whoſe inditemẽt was, that they had conſpired; firſt, to deſtroy the King; ſecondly, to raiſe Rebellion; thirdly, to alter Reli-

Religion; fourthly, to ſubuert the State; and laſtly, to procure forraine Inuaſion. That theſe their intents they had made knowne vnto the Lord Grey, whom they meant ſhould haue beene Earle Marſhall of England, Watſon Lord Chancellor, George Brooke Lord Treaſurer, and Sir Griffin Markham Secretary. That with the King, the Lords alſo ſhould bee ſurprized in their Chambers at Greenwich, and the Lord Major and Aldermen of London ſhould be ſent for, and ſo be ſhut vp in the Tower.

(12) George Brooke hereunto anſwered (with a colour and pretext as lewd as the attempt) that hee had Commiſſion from the King to doe what he did, only to try faithfull Subiects; which commiſſion hee could not produce. Sir Griffin Markham (excepting onely the imputation of blood) confeſſed his offence very penitently, alleadging, it was through a diſcontented mind, and deſired the Lords to bee a meane to the King for mercy. Watſon and Clarke (the former of which confeſſed hee had drawne all thoſe Gentlemen into theſe plots) did vainely and ignorantly auerre, that they held the King no King, vntill hee was crowned; and that therefore it could not bee Treaſon: alleadging, that Saul was not King, vntill he was choſen in Mizpeh, though he had beene Anointed in Ramah by Samuel the Prophet; neither Ieroboam, who in the dayes of Salomon, had been confirmed by the Prophet to raign ouer Iſrael, vntill the people made him King vpon the fooliſh anſwers of Reboboam. Thus theſe great Rabbies made no difference betwixt the mediate and ordinary ſucceſſion of lawfull Princes, ordained by God to be his Vice-gerents in fully eſtabliſhed Common-weales, and thoſe Kings which himſelfe extraordinarily aduanced, and erected to bee the whips in his hand; as the firſt manifeſtly proued, when they had caſt off Samuel, and the latter allotted to no other end, as by the Prophet is apparant, where God to him ſaith, I gaue them a King in mine anger, and I tooke him away in my wrath; but the more learned enformed them, that in England is no Inter-regnum, becauſe the King neuer dieth, and that the coronation is but a Ceremony to ſhew the King to the people.

Maſter George Brooke condemned.

(13) Two dayes after was Sir Walter Raughley brought to the Barre, beeing indited for combining with the Lord Cobham (his accuſer) in the foreſaid deſignes. Whereunto he pleaded not guilty, and ſo ſtood for his purgation, as hee held argument from morning till night, to the hearers no little admiration, that a man of ſo exquiſite vnderſtanding and experience ſhould giue conſent vnto ſuch a plot, no leſſe foule, then fooliſh. Yet in fine hee was found guilty, and had ſentence of death.

Nouemb. 17. Sir Walter Raughley arraigned and condemned.

(14) The like iudgement, a few dayes after, paſſed vpon the Lords, Cobham and Grey, arraigned on two ſeuerall daies. The former being indited, for combining with Sir Walter Raughley and George Brooke, to procure forces from the King of Spaine and the Arch-Duke, for an Inuaſion, &c. the other, for ioyning with the foreſaid Prieſts, Knights, and Gentlemen, in their fore-mentioned conſpiracies. The Lord Chancellor of England, beeing Lord Steward for that ſeruice, ſate vnder a Cloth of Eſtate in the vpper end of the Hall, the Nobles ſitting (as their Peeres and Iudges) on benches vpon both ſides. Thoſe at the Barre he willed to bee bold, and to anſwer without feare: the Kings learned Councell he intreated, not to confound the memory of the priſoners with vnneceſſary matters: and the Peeres, though vnſworne, hee aduiſed to try indifferently betwixt the King and the arraigned; who both pleading not guilty, were yet found otherwiſe by the Court, and receiued iudgement of death.

The Lords Cobham and Grey arraigned and condemned.

(15) Of all theſe arraigned, Sir Edward Parham only was acquitted by the Iury, and of all the reſt onely three died, which were Watſon, Clarke, and Maſter George Brooke: the firſt of which, hauing at large laid open in Print, the Treaſons and vnſufferable machinations of the Ieſuiticall Order, left this ſuſpition on them at his death, that they, in reuenge, had cunningly and couertly drawne him into this Action, which brought him to this ſhamefull end. After whoſe death, his Maieſty then at Wilton, (hauing commanded his Lords, to deliuer the true narration vnto him of the whole proceeding in the arraignements and anſweres of all the reſt) ſigned alſo a warrant for the execution of the Lords Cobham & Grey, as alſo Markham, to be performed the Friday following before ten of the clocke in the morning. Notwithſtanding, his Maieſty more mooued to milde mercy, then the high ſtraine of Iuſtice, of his Princely and free clemency, gaue life vnto

The Kings Letters for ſtay of the Execution.

(16) Althouch it be true, that all vell gouernid and flooriſhing Kingdomes and Commonvealthis aire eſtabliſhid by Iuſtice, and that theſe tuo Noblemen by birth, that aire nou vpon the point of execution, aire for their treaſonable practiſes cõdemnid by the Law, & adiudgit voorthy of the execution thaireof, to the exemple and terror of otheris: The one of thaim hauing filthily practiſed the ouerthrow of the quhole Kingdome, and the other for the ſurpriſe of our owin Perſonne: yet in regaird that this is the firſt yere of our Raigne in this Kingdome, & that neuer King was ſo far oblieſhid to his People as ve haue been to this, by our entry here vith ſo hairty and generall an applauſe of all ſorts. And ſince ve vill not haue our Lawis to haue reſpect to perſonis in ſparing the great, and ſtrikking the meaner ſort; It is our pleaſure, that the like courſe be alſo taken vith Marckham, being ſorry from our hairt, that ſuch is, not onely the heynous nature of the ſaidis condemned perſonis crime, but euen the corruption is ſo great of thair naturall diſpoſition, as the care ve haue for the ſafety and quiet of our State and good Subiectis, vill not permit vs to vſe that Clemency towardis thaim, quich in our owin natural inclination, vee micht very eaſily be perſvaded vnto.

The Kings mercifull repriue of the Priſoners ready to dye.

(17) This Letter thus framed, the deliuery therof his Maieſty committed vnto one Iohn Gibb a Scottiſh Gentleman, a diſcreet perſon, and free from dependancy of any Noble man or Councellor, neither was he of any extraordinary ranke, as well that the by-ſtanders ſhould not obſerue any alteration for the execution, as the delinquents themſelues take any apprehenſion by his preſence, to the end that each of them ſeuerally ſhould prepare to breathe out their laſt breth, with a true confeſſion of their ſecret conſciences. The time approching, Sir Griffin Markham brought to the Scaffold, (to that end erected on the Caſtle Greene) made himſelfe ready for the ſtroke of the Axe, when ſecretly Maſter Gibb deliuered vnto the high * Sheriffe of the Shire the Kings Warrant to the contrary, who ſoone perceiuing his Maieſties intent, tooke backe the priſoner, (as if hee were firſt to confront the two Lords in the Hall vpon ſome ſeruice to the King,) from the Scaffold, and brought him into the Caſtle Hall. Then was the Lord Grey brought forth, who hauing powred out his prayers vnto God, at length kneeling down for the ſtroke of death, the Sheriffe bad ſtay, telling the Lord, that ſome further ſeruice was expected of him, and thereupon likewiſe led him againe into the Caſtle. The Lord Cobham then was brought to the Scaffold, who being in prayers and preparation for death, the Lord Grey and Sir Griffin were brought backe againe, where the priſoners all three appearing together on the Scaffold, the Sheriffe notified his Maieſties Warrant for the ſtay of their Executions, and that as then they ſhould not dye. Vpon which rare Clemency, vnexpected both of priſoners and ſpectators, aroſe ſuch ſhouts of the people as was wonderfull, crying, God ſaue the King, and the condemned ouercome with his Clemency, wiſhed they might ſacrifice their liues to redeeme their own faults, and to repurchaſe ſo mercifull a Princes loue.

* Sir Ben. Tichborn.

Sir Griffin Markham returned from the Scaffold.

The Lord Cobham, Lord Grey, and Sir Griffin Markham repriued.

(18) This buſineſſe thus tranſacted, for the ſafety of the Kings Perſon and whole Kingdome; his Maieſty, (who well conſidered, that the quiet of a Weale-Publike cannot poſſibly ſubſiſt long, without the peace and well-managed gouernment of the Church,) hauing among many other Petitions which were preſented to Him at his firſt entrance, receiued one from certaine perſons of ouer-zealous ſpirits, againſt the eſtabliſhed Gouernment and Liturgy in the Engliſh Church, reſolued now by his Princely iudgement, as another Hezekiah, to breake the Brazen Serpent, if Idolatry were therunto committed, and like a ſecond Ioſiah, to reade the Law of the Lord himſelfe: whereupon by Proclamation he commanded an aſſembly

(19) The firſt ſitting was vpon Saturday, the foureteenth of Ianuary, in his Maieſties Priuy-chamber at Hampton-Court, whereinto the Church-Gouernours onely being admitted (by his Maieſties command) in the preſence of his Priuy Councell, he made a moſt godly and Princely declaration of his intent, in ſummoning this Aſſembly, in effect, "thus; That this his proceeding was no "nouell deuice, but according to the ex- "ample of all Chriſtian Princes, who in "the commencement of their raignes, "vſually take the firſt courſe for the e- "ſtabliſhing of the Church both for "doctrine and Policy, to which the "very Heathen themſelues had relation "in this their Prouerbe, à Ioue Princi- "pium. And particularly in this Land, "King Henry the eighth, towards the end "of his Raigne, after him King Edward "the ſixt, who altred more; after him "Queene Mary, who reuerſed all; and "the laſt Queene of famous memory, "who ſettled the Church-ſtate as now "it ſtandeth. Wherein yet his Maieſty "deemed himſelfe happier then they, "in that they were faine to alter thoſe "things which they found eſtabliſhed, "whereas himſelfe ſaw yet no cauſe, ſo "much to change any thing, as to con- "firme that which Hee found ſo well "ſettled already. Which State ſo affe- "cted his Royall heart, that it pleaſed "him, both to enter into a gratulation to "Almighty God, (at which words hee "put off his Hat) for bringing him into "the Land of Promiſe, where Religion "was purely profeſſed, where hee ſate a- "mong graue, learned, and reuerend Di- "uines, who better knew what belon- "ged to the State of a King, to the ho- "nour and order of a kingdome; then "ſome other Nations did, and withall to "aſſure the Prelacy there preſent, that He "intended not any Innouation, acknow- "ledging the Gouernment Eccleſiaſti- "call to haue beene approoued by mani- "fold bleſſings from God himſelfe, both "for the increaſe of the Goſpell, and "with a moſt happy and glorious peace. "Yet, becauſe nothing could be ſo ab- "ſolutely ordered, but that ſomewhat "might be added, and in any State, as in "the body of man, Corruptions like ill "humors might inſenſibly grow either "through time or perſons; his purpoſe "was, after the example of a good Phy- "ſician, to make ſearch into the ſuppoſed "diſeaſes, & to examine the complaints, "ſo to remooue the occaſions thereof, if "they prooue ſcandalous, or to cure "them, if they were dangerous, or if but "friuolous, yet to take knowledge of "them, thereby at once both to caſt a ſop "into the mouth of Cerberus, and of all "factious ſpirits, and withall to giue ſa- "tisfaction to all quiet and ſober-min- "ded men.

His Maieſties Oration vnto the Clergy.

(20) His Maieſty concluding this his generall aduertiſement, entred more particular diſcourſe with the Biſhops (for his owne priuate information) concerning the Booke of Common Prayer, Excommunication in the Eccleſiaſticall Courts, and the prouiſion of fit and able Miniſters for Ireland. Touching matters in the ſaid Booke, hee deſired ſatisfaction. Firſt, for Confirmation, which if it were held and ſo called, as if the Sacrament of Baptiſme were thereby confirmed, and were inualidous without it, then was it in his iudgement blaſphemous: but if it were onely that Children, who at their Baptiſme made profeſſion of their faith by the mouthes of others, might before the Biſhops profeſſe it in their owne perſons, and ſo receiue Epiſcopall Benediction by prayer, and impoſition of hands, then was it of very ſacred vſe in Gods Church. Secondly, for Abſolution, which his Maieſty had heard compared to the Popes pardons. Thirdly, for Priuate Baptiſme, which he vtterly diſliked to be adminiſtred, but by a lawful Miniſter. His ſecõd point was Excommunication, wherein he moued two eſpeciall conſiderations; the one, of the Matter, that the ſentence being ſo waighty, was not to bee pronounced vpon euery ſlight cauſe: the other, of the Perſons, why Lay-men as Chancellors and Commiſſaries, and not rather the Deane and

Of Abſolution.

Abſolution, it was anſwered, that as Chriſt deſired not the death of ſinners, ſo he hath giuen power & commandement to his Miniſters, to pronounce his mercy with remiſſion of ſinnes vnto all Penitents, that the practice hereof in the Engliſh Church, is ſo farre from Popery, as that the Reformed Churches of Auguſta, Boheme, & Saxony, doe both allow it, and retaine it, yea, & Caluin himſelf approues it.

Of Priuate Baptiſme.

Of Priuate Baptiſme it was anſwered, that though the words ſeemed ſomwhat doubtfull, yet the practice of the Engliſh Church did contradict all adminiſtration of it by Laickes & women, in cenſuring them in that caſe: whereupon it was concluded, that a lawfull Miniſter onely ſhould be imployed in times of neceſſity, when the Infant was in danger of life; yet ſo vnderſtood, that the perſon was in no wiſe to be reputed of the Eſſence of the Sacrament.

Of Excommunication.

And finally, for Excommunication, it was there reſolued, that the abuſes (if any ſuch there were) being remooued and amended, that ſacred cenſure ſhould retaine its neceſſary vigour in the Church; and ſo for that day his Maieſty diſmiſſed the Aſſembly of his Prelates.

The other Doctors appeare before his Maieſty.

(22) Vpon Munday following, being the ſixteenth of Ianuary, thoſe other Doctors, who were to relate the diſlikes of the Oppoſites, were called likewiſe into the Priuy Chamber, where in preſence of his Prelates and Peeres, his Maieſty deliuered vnto them, a pithy and Princely declaration of his mind, "That "Hee intended not to innouate the go- "uernment now eſtabliſhed, which by "long experience he had found accom- "pliſhed with ſo ſingular bleſſings of "God forty fiue yeers, as that no Church "vpon the face of the earth hath more "flouriſhed then this of England. But ra- "ther his meaning, & earneſt deſire was, "firſt to ſettle vniformity thorow the "whole, for the more quiet and flouriſh- "ing eſtate thereof: ſecondly, to plant "vnity for the ſuppreſſion of Papiſts, and "enemies of Religion: thirdly, to amend "abuſes, as incident to Bodies Politicke, as "the ſhadow to the body Natural; which "once getting entrance, hold on as a "Wheele doth his motion, when it is "once ſet on going. Among the com- "plaints therefore of many grieuances "made ſince his entrance into England, "none was more weighty, nor himſelfe "more willing to heare and amend, then "ſuch as might concerne the ſtate of the "Church, if the ſame did in any wiſe de- "cline from the ancient and Apoſtolicall "rule. For which cauſe he had ſent for "them, whom hee vnderſtood to bee "graue, learned, and modeſt Diuines, to "heare by them thoſe grieuances, and "ſeuerall obiections at large, and deſi- "red them boldly to declare the ſame.

His Maieſty moſt willing to amend abuſes.

(23) Whereupon Doctor Reinolds, a very learned man, after a preamble gratulatory (vpon his knees) with acknowledgement of Gods mercy in giuing vs ſo godly, ſo learned, ſo carefull a King, reduced all matters, either deſired or diſliked amongſt the weake Brethren (whoſe Spokeſman hee proteſted hee would not haue beene, but onely vpon his Maieſties mandatory Summons) vnto thoſe foure heads: 1. for preſeruation of true doctrine; 2. for placing of good Paſtors; 3. for ſincere adminiſtration of the Church gouernment; 4. for explanation of ſome clauſes in the Common-prayer Booke. It would bee here too impertinent, to force an hiſtoricall Narration with thoſe Theological particulars, which vpon thoſe ſeuerall points were then produced, & are * elſewhere to be found exactly related. Yet as we cannot but commend the iudgement of theſe foure Diuines (as touching the third point) in that, finding no iuſt exception to the Epiſcopall Hierarchy of our Church, in no one word they impugned or diſapprooued the ſame; ſo much more muſt we celebrate the admirall dexterity, iudgement and learning of his ſacred Maieſty, ioyned with ſo rare induſtry and patience, whoſe owne accurate curate ſearch and exquiſite expoſitions of Scriptures, Fathers, and primitiue practices, did there both breed wonder and aſtoniſhment in that noble and learned audience, and alſo giue ſingular ſatisfaction (euen to the * agents for the Oppoſites) touching all the exceptions taken to the Church-ſtate; which his Maieſty now found to be no other then the phantaſmes of a ſcrupulous indiſcretion.

* They all promiſed obediēce and Doctor Sparke writ a booke to perſwade vnto conformity.

(24) The Wedneſday following, being the 18. of Ianuary (appointed for the next meeting) his Maieſty againe, with moſt of the Lords of his Priuy Councell, entred the Chamber; where the Reuerend Prelates with ſuch others onely as the L. Archbiſhop appointed, (for ſo his Maieſty commanded) being admitted to his Royall preſence, after ſome conference about the High Commiſſion Court, Subſcription, Oath ex officio, and the like, his Maieſty (cauſing the other foure Diuines to bee then called in) was pleaſed to declare what formerly had paſt; and for a concluſion, ſhut vp "all with a godly exhortation, like an- "other Conſtantine, perſwading euery "man to vnity, & to a diligent diſcharge "of their duties, in their ſeuerall places; "the ſuperiors to gouerne without vio- "lence, the inferiors to obey without "murmuring, and all of them to build "Gods Temple without ſound of diſ- "cord; deſiring and commanding all "preſent, not only themſelues to labour "that way, but to be a meanes to draw "on all others vnto a peaceable confor- "mity, the matters being no other (as "now hee ſaw plainely) but of meere "weakeneſſe: wherein perſons diſcreet "would doubtleſſe bee eaſily hencefor- "ward reclaimed, and for the vndiſcréet "and reluctant, their roomes were more "behouefull then their ſeruices: by their "fruites therefore Hee ſhould diſcerne "and iudge them; Obedience and Hu- "mility being the markes of honeſt and "good men, which thence-forth hee "would expect from as many as would "be held wel affected to his Maieſty and "his State. Which Princely exhortation (deliuered with much more feeling words, and mouing earneſtneſſe) was ſo piercing, as it fetched teares from ſome of both ſides, and all vnanimouſly proteſted their moſt dutifull obedience to thoſe his Royall commands.

The concluſion of the Conference.

(25) Beſides this maine fruit of this famous conference, the ſettling of the Church-peace, ſundry other importāt matters (not here to be pretermitted, becauſe neceſſarily tending to that noble end) were therein alſo proiected, and by his Maieſties euer-prouident care had then their conception, though after-times brought the births to perfection. The firſt (both in due ranke and vſe) was his ſacred Decree for a new Tranſlation of the holy Scriptures, vpon a Princely and pious care of Gods eternall Truth according to the Originals, as alſo for an vniforme reading thereof in the Churches. To which end three ſelected Companies from Oxford, Cambridge, and in London, moſt iudicious in the languages and learning being imployed, after long conference, much reading, and diligent comparing of all tranſlations with the ancient originals, it is now moſt exactly and happily publiſhed, as a witneſſe to the World both of Gods conſtant promiſe, that Heauen and Earth ſhould periſh, but his Word ſhould neuer: and alſo of the Religious care of this his Vice-gerent, in ſeeking euen at the firſt, the firſt thing that man is commanded to ſeeke after, whoſe praiſe ſhall ſtand for euer in the Record of that godly worke, and the worke ſhall iuſtifie it ſelfe againſt all gaine-ſayers, to Gods eternall glory, and many ſoules great comfort.

The tranſlation of the Bible intended and commanded.

(26) His ſecond ſacred proiect was, that as now in England, ſo alſo in Ireland, Wales, & the Northerne parts, true Religion (which Hee there auowed to be the onely band of true obedience) might be throughly planted. Which religious purpoſe Hee ſo zealouſly proſecuted, eſpecially for the North and all Scotland, as that Hee held it not ſufficient to haue ioyned theſe two Kingdomes into one Temporall Monarchy, vnleſſe Hee might ſee them both vnited alſo in the Doctrine, Regiment and Rites of one ſpirituall Hierarchy. Neither was his Princely wiſdome for the meanes leſſe conſpicuous, then his zeale in the intendment, in making ſo heedfull choyce of ſuch Engliſh Diuines, as were (not long after) in this imployment ſent into Scotland; the very firſt, in which Apoſtolike Ambaſſage for eſtabliſhing thoſe Neighbour-Churches was He, whoſe eminency both for Place and Piety, is now worthily formoſt in guiding our owne; and whoſe bleſſed trauels in that ſeruice, as they were acceptable to God, his Maieſty, and that Nation; ſo are they a document to others, how powerfull and admirably ſucceſſefull true Learning is, where it is guided with with true Prudence, and where Piety and loue of Gods glory is linked with Charity, and zeale of mans good.

A Parliament held March 19. The Church-Lands not to be alienated.

(27) This great busineſſe and conference ſo royally accompliſhed, his Maieſties next care was (herein alſo as another Conſtantine) to perpetuate the maintenance of this flouriſhing Church (whoſe peaceable eſtate hee had thus prouided for) with the reuenewes of her ancient foundations, as alſo to eſtabliſh ſalutary lawes for the peaceable gouernment of his people; to which purpoſe, a Parliament was aſſembled at Weſtminſter, the 19. of March, wherein, for the Church it was enacted, that neither Archbiſhop nor Biſhop ſhould alienate, aſſure, giue, grant, demiſe, or in any ſort conuay, no not to the King himſelfe, his Heires, or Succeſſors, any of the Honours, Caſtles, Manors, Lands, Tenements, or Hereditaments, being parcell of the poſſeſſions of his Archbiſhopricke, or Biſhopricke; and if any ſo were, to be vtterly voyde and of none effect, notwithſtanding any former Law, Statute, Act, or Ordinance to the contrary.

Ex Parliament. Iacobi primi.

March 15. The Kings triumphant paſſage thorow London.

(28) Foure dayes before this Parliament commenced, it pleaſed his Maieſty, with the moſt Noble Queene Anne, and the moſt Illuſtrious Prince Henry, attēded with glorious troupes of great Peeres, Prelates, and Courtiers, to ride in triumph thorow the City of London to Weſtminſter, the Houſes beautified with rich hangings, the ſtreets adorned with goodly Trophées and Pageants, of ſeuerall Nations inhabiting, the Rayles on both ſides couered with blue Cloth, the ſeuerall Companies Honourably addreſſed, and ranked vnder the diſplayed Enſignes & Armes of their ſeuerall Trades and Sciences; the one ſhewing the wealth and ſtate of the City; the other, the body of the Citizens and gouernment; and all making manifeſt the vnſpeakeable ioy they conceiued to receiue their great Soueraigne into this His City, and Imperiall Chamber. In pledge of which their exceſſiue ioy, vnfained loue, and vowed fidelity, the Recorder at the Croſſe in Cheape, both gratulated his Maieſty with a * pithy ſpeech in the Name of the City, and wiſhing him a golden Raigne, preſented his Greatneſſe with a Cup of Gold; deliuering another likewiſe to the Queene, and a third to the Prince, which were all no leſſe graciouſly accepted, then moſt louingly preſented.

Sir Henry Montague.

* See Iohn Stowes Annal.

(29) Neither leſſe was his Maieſties deſire to retaliate the Citizens and other his Subiects true affections, when recounting the great hinderances of Merchandizing and Nauigations of trafficke, by reaſon of the long continued breach betwixt England and Spaine, his royall heart tendring his Subiects tranquillitie, endeauoured to ſalue againe thoſe wounds of diſcord, with the * ſweet balmes of Peace; which was ſolemnly proclaimed in London, Auguſt 19. the Sea being made open to Merchants for their free commerce.

* Pſal. 141. 6.

The two Kingdomes vnited vnder the name of Great-Britaine.

(30) Both Domeſticke and forraine affaires thus plauſibly compoſed, as his Maieſty was the firſt, who in this laſt age of the World held the Scepter of the whole Iland in his Royall hand, ſo to vnite the two Styles vnder the name of one entire Empire, and the two Nations into a ioynt bleſſed vnity; Hee cauſed himſelfe by Proclamation to be enſtiled, King of Great Britaine, according to the ancient name of this Ile before the Saxons Conqueſt; the reſtoring of which name againe, many fore-dooming ſpirits had anciently preſaged, as now wee ſee effected. Vnto which Imperiall ſtyle, are rightly annexed the Kingdomes of France and Ireland, rightfully belonging by birth and Conqueſt vnto the Crowne of England.

Ieſuites and Seminary Prieſts baniſhed.

(31) Two other Proclamations afterwards came forth; the one, for the Baniſhment of all Ieſuites and Seminary Prieſts, out of the Land; and the other, to confirme the Eccleſiaſticall gouernment, and Booke of Common Prayer, in the ſame forme and eſtate, as Queene Elizabeth left them, to the no little griefe of the workers for Rome, whoſe deſignes began now to ſucke in ſuch poyſon, as in the venting whereof, not only the Earth might haue trembled vnder the weight of ſuch Monſters, but euen the Heauens be aſtonied and confounded, to giue thoſe Serpents the breath or benefit of Ayre. Vnto which bloody, horrible, and odious act to God and man, my Style muſt now turne: a matter indeed ſo diſtaſtiue for me to remember, or to write of, that it abhorres my very ſoule to fill the Pen with Inke, or to blot the Paper with theſe blacke ſpots of darkeneſſe, and deformers of Englands faire face.

Ier. 2. 12. The Treaſon conceiued againſt the State.

The heathenish cruelty of the Gunpowder Treaſon.

(32) The Plot was to vndermine the Parliament Houſe, and with Gunpowder to blow vp the King, the Prince, Clergy, Nobles, Knights, and Burgeſſes, the very confluence of all the flower of Glory, Glory, Piety, Learning, Prudence, Authority in the Land; Fathers, Sons, Brothers, Allyes, Friends, Foes, Papists, and Protestants, all at one blast. A stratagem inuented by him that blowes the bellowes of destruction; fashioned in the forge of the bottomlesse pit; put in practice in a vault of darkenesse; and forwarded by him that is the Father of darkenesse; and in darkenesse I could wish it might euer dwell: whose like was neuer reuealed to the light of the Sunne. Their intent, when that irreligious atchieuement had beene performed, was, to surprize the remainder of the Kings Issue; to alter Religion and the State, and to bring in forraine Power. Sir Edmund Baynam an attainted person (who styled himselfe Prince of the damned Crue) was sent vnto the Pope, as he was a temporall Prince, to acquaint him with the Gunpowder-Treason; a fit Poast indeed to be imployed betwixt the Pope and the Diuell.

The Traytors Intents.

(33) This Treason was first set on foot in the last yeere of the late Queens Raign, when Henry Garnet the Superiour of the Iesuites, Catesby and others sent Thomas Winter into Spaine to negociate with King Philip in the name of the English Catholikes; first, to send an Army vnto them, who now were in a readinesse to ioyne their Forces with his: secondly, to grant some Pensions vnto sundry persons deuoted to his seruice in England: and thirdly, to giue aduertisement of the discontents that the young Gentlemen and Souldiers had conceiued vpon the death of Essex, wherby a most fit occasion was then offered to forward the common cause. To prosecute which businesse, hee made for his meanes Father Creswell the Leiger Iesuite in Spaine, Don Petro Franceса second Secretary to the State, and the Duke of Lerma, a great Councellor to the King; all of them assuring this ill-commissioned Ambassador, that the Office of his imployment would bee very gratefull to their Master.

Winter sent into Spaine.

(34) The place for landing concluded vpon by these wise Statists, was Kent or Essex, if the Kings Army were great; if otherwise, then Milford Hauen in Wales was held fittest: with these and other like complots, Winter all that Summer followed the King in his Progresse, and lastly had answer by the Count Miranda, that his King would bestow a hundred thousand Crownes towards the expedition, halfe thereof to bee paid that present yeere, and the rest in the next Spring, when (at the fartheſt) hee meant to set foot in England; on whose behalfe he willed the English Catholikes to maintaine their promise, whom hee respected (as was auowed) as his owne proper Castilians: And further desired their continuall aduertisements, if in the meane time it chanced the old Queene to dye.

The plots determined for the Inuasion of England.

King Philips answer and offer.

(35) Winter thus laden with hopes, returneth from Spaine, and emptieth his male into the bosomes of Garnet, Catesby and Tresham, and they vnto others; all of them tickled to heare the newes, rested fully satisfied, expecting the day. But before the Spring-time was fully approached, that Morning Starre, & Mirror of her Sex, did set in our West, the thrice-glorious Elizabeth, who had now iudged Israel full forty foure yeeres in admirable tranquillity, as in her Raigne wee haue sufficiently seen. To signifie whose death, Christopher Wright was from Catesby and others sent into Spaine, and Guy Fawkes likewise was posted thither from Bruxels, by Sir William Stanley, both of them to prosecute the former negotiation, assuring the Spanish King, that King Iames meant to runne the same course, and to proceed as rigorously against the Catholikes, as the late Queene had done: for whose defence they instantly desired that some Spaniards might be transported vnto Milford Hauen, where the Romish-minded would be forward to assist them, hauing in a readinesse two thousand horse furnished for the enterprize. But King Philip aswell poyzing his honour, as his zeale for Religion, and obseruing a great difference betwixt States in hostility, and of Kings raigning in friendship, in no wise would listen to inuade England, or further to proceed in any forcible enterprize.

The hopes of the English Catholikes.

Christopher wright sent into Spaine, to signifie the death of the Queene.

Proceedings against Traytors, page 72.

King Philip refuseth all hostile attempts against England.

(36) In the meane while the Iesuites had beene tampering to dissuade the acceptance of King Iames into England, vrging it for a Maxime, that death was to bee endured, rather then to admit an heretike (so it pleased them to tearme the Lords Anointed) and those that gaue him consent, they held lyable to Excommunication by the censure of Pope Clement the eighth, who had liberally bestowed vpon his sacred Person, the names of a Puritan, an Heretike, a Caluinist, a persecutor of Protestants, and another Iulian Apostata.

left by that Pylote to ſhift for themſelues, now perceiued their owne error, in their long expectation, That change of State, would change Religion: but Shee now gone, whoſe life they had often laid for, and her godly Succeſſour no whit inferiour to her for aduancing the Goſpell: their hopes grew deſperate (as theſe deſperates alleaged) & no other meanes now left them, but onely to kil the King, whom they falſely calumniated to haue broken his promiſe for a toleration in Religion, as Watſon and Percy had diuulged among them; yea, and a fraudulent meſſage was ſent to the Pope by the Scotiſh Secretary, that King Iames would become his obedient ſonne. But how farre his religious heart was from theſe aſperſions, appeared both by Watſon himſelfe, who, condemned to die, Tooke it vpon the ſaluation of his ſoule, that he could not draw the ſmalleſt comfort from the King for a toleration of the Catholikes, but that himſelf had imparted his words in a milder tune then his Maieſty meant them, onely to keepe (as hee excuſed the matter) the Catholikes in loue and duty vnto the King: and ſince by the Lord of Balmerinoth (Secretary to the King in Scotland) who acknowledging his offence, hath beene arraigned and found guilty of death, for deuiſing Letters, and ſending them to Rome, which himſelf cunningly got ſigned in ſhuffling them amongſt others, his Maieſty being vtterly ignorant of the Contents.

King Iames ſcandalized by the Papiſts.

(38) Vpon which falſe ſuggeſtions, the Atheiſticall poſition of Catesby was grounded, who held it for an Axiome, as Father Parſons had taught: That the whole Schoole both of Diuines and Lawyers make it a poſition certaine, and to be vndoubtedly beleeued, That if any Chriſtian Prince whatſoeuer, ſhall manifeſtly turne from the Catholike Religion, and deſire or ſeek to reclaime other men from the ſame, hee preſently falleth from all Princely power and dignity, and that alſo by vertue & power of the Law it ſelfe both diuine and humane, euen before any ſentence propounded againſt him by the ſupreme Paſtor and Iudge. And that his Subiects, of what eſtate or condition ſoeuer, are freed from all bond of Oath of Alleagiance, which at any time they had made vnto him as to their lawfull Prince. Nay, that they both may and ought (prouided they haue competent ſtrength and force) caſt out ſuch a man from bearing rule among Chriſtians, as an Apoſtata, and Heretike; a Backeſlider, and Reuolter from our Lord Ieſus Chriſt; and an enemy to his owne State and Common-wealth, leſt perhaps hee might infect others, or by his example or command turne them from the faith. Yea, one ſtep further elſe-where is ſtood vpon, that if any Prince ſhall but fauour or ſhew countenance to an Hereticke, he preſently loſeth his Kingdome. And thus they conclude, that for Hereſie a Prince is to bee depoſed, and his Kingdome to be beſtowed at the pleaſure of the Pope, for whom the people vpon paine of damnation are to take part and fight: out of which deteſtable concluſions, aroſe the firſt ſmoake of the Gunpowder Treaſon.

(42) No, Tom (ſaid Catesby) thou ſhalt not aduenture thy ſelfe to ſo ſmall purpoſe; if thou wilt be a Traytor, there is a Plot to greater aduantage, and ſuch a one as can neuer bee diſcouered: and thereupon all of them taking the Oath of ſecreſie, hearing the Maſſe, and receiuing the Sacrament, Catesby told them his diuelliſh deuice, which was, by Myne and Gunpowder to blow vp the Parliament Houſe, and at one ſtroke with the deſtruction of many, effect that at once, which had been many yeeres in attempting. A matter eaſily performed (as hee vrged) if men of reſolution would thereunto beſtow their purſe and their paines; and moſt ſure from ſuſpicion of diſcouery, the deſigne being ſo eſtranged from the conceit of man: wherein he alſo obſerued, that religious Iuſtice was thirſty of reuenge, euen vpon the ſame perſons, and in the ſame place, whence ſhe firſt receiued the vniuſt Lawes enacted againſt her. For caſe of conſcience to kill the Innocent, with the nocent; he told them it was warrantable by the authority of Garnet himſelfe, the Superiour of the Engliſh Ieſuites, and of Gerrard, and Teſmond (Ieſuiticall Prieſts likewiſe) who by their Apoſtolicall Power did abſolue & commend the fact, which for the aduantage of the Catholikes was to be executed (they ſaid) though with the death of ſome Innocents, rather then the ſeruice ſhould quaile, the neceſſitie of time and occaſion ſo requiring it. The Oath was giuen them by the ſaid Gerrard (the Diuels Atturney in this buſineſſe) the forme whereof was as followeth:

The Gunpowder Plot reuealed among the Conſpirators.

Catesbies obſeruations for Iuſtice.

The Oath of ſecrecie miniſtred to the Traitors.

You ſhall ſweare by the bleſſed Trinitie, and by the Sacrament you now purpoſe to receiue, neuer to diſcloſe directly, nor indirectly, by word or circumſtance, the matter that ſhall be propoſed to you to keepe ſecret, nor deſiſt from the execution thereof, vntill the reſt ſhall giue you leaue.

(43) The project thus farre paſſed, the practice was to proceed: & the firſt thing ſought after, was for a Houſe wherein they might begin their worke. To which purpoſe, no place was held fitter then a certaine Edifice adioyning to the wall of the Parliament Houſe, which ſerued for withdrawing roomes for the Aſſembled Lords; and out of Parliament, was at the diſpoſe of the Keeper of the Place, and Wardrobe thereunto belonging. Theſe did Percy hire for his Lodgings, entertaining Fawkes (as moſt vnknowne by face) for his man; who changing his name into Iohnſon, had the keyes and keeping of the roomes. Neither was this enough, but a Houſe muſt be alſo had to ſupply Percies Lodgings, for prouiſion of Powder, and to frame and fit Wood for the carriage of the Myne: which Catesby prouided at Lambeth, & ſware Robert Keyes into their conſpiracies, making him the Keeper of thoſe his prouiſions; who in the night, as occaſion ſerued, conueyed the ſame vnto the cuſtodie of Fawkes.

that honorable Aſſembly diſſolued vpon the 11. of December late in the night, they entred into their Worke of Darkeneſſe, and begun their Mine; hauing tooles prepared, and baked meats prouided, the better to auoid ſuſpition by ſending abroad.

Robert Catesby. Thomas Percy. Thomas Winter. Iohn Wright. Guy Fawkes. Thomas Bates.

(45) The Moles that firſt vnderwent theſe vnderminings, were Robert Catesby Eſquire, the mooving Arch-Traytor, and ruine of his name, Thomas Percy Eſquire, kinſman and attendant vpon the Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Winter, Iohn Wright, and Guy Fawkes, Gentlemen, and Thomas Bates, Catesbies man, all of them grounded Schollers of the Romiſh Schoole, and ſuch earneſt labourers in this their Vault of Villany, that by Chriſtmas Eue (which very day might haue remembred them of more Chriſtian workes) they had brought the worke vnder an entry, vnto the wall of the Parliament Houſe, vnderpropping ſtill, as they went, the earth with their framed Timber, nor till that day were they ſeene abroad of any man.

The Traytors conference how to proceed after their Treaſons.

(46) During this vndermining, much conſultation was had how to faſhion the reſt of the buſineſſe, after the deed ſhould be accompliſhed, and many queſtions propounded and argued at full, before they could pitch on a ſettled reſolution. The firſt was how to ſurprize the next heire to the Crowne; for though they doubted not, but Prince Henry would accompany his Father, and take his lot with him, yet they feared leſt D. Charles (being abſent, as too young to attend at Parliament) would eſcape their traine, & perchance be ſo carefully guarded, and attended vpon at Court, that hee would hardly bee gotten into their hands. Of which firſt rub in their way, Percy offered himſelfe to bee the firſt remoouer, and ſhewed his meanes, which was, that with ſome other Gentlemen, hee would enter the Dukes Chamber, which by reaſon of his acquaintance he very well might doe without any ſuſpition: and others of his like acquaintance ſhould be placed at ſeuerall doores in the Court: ſo that when the blow was giuen, and all men in a maze, then would hee carry away the Duke, which he preſumed would be eaſily done, the moſt of the Court being then abſent, and the preſent altogether vnprouided for to make reſiſtance.

The Lady Elizabeth intended to be taken from the Lord Harrington.

(47) For the ſurprize of the Lady Elizabeth, it was held a matter of farre leſſe difficultie, Shee remaining at the Lord Harringtons, and Aſhby (Catesbies Houſe) neere vnto her, whither vnder a ſhew of Hunting, diuers Catholikes ſhould bee gathered, who hauing the aduantage in knowing for what purpoſe they were aſſembled, had the full liberty of that diſtracted time, to prouide money, horſes, armour, and other abiliments of warre, vnder pretence of ſtrength to guard and ſecure the Heire apparant.

(48) Then it was diſcuſſed, what Lords they ſhould ſaue from the Parliament; where it was agreed, that they ſhould keepe thence as many as they could that were Catholikes, or that way fauouring; all others to feele the ſmarr, and the imputation of the Treaſon to be caſt vpon the Puritanes, to make them more odious to the World.

The feares conceiued to open the Treaſons to forraine Princes.

(49) Next it was controuerſed, what forraine Princes ſhould be made priuy to theſe their purpoſes; for to enioyne them to ſecreſie, or to obliege them by oath, was not in their power: and to aſſay their likes or diſlikes, would proue dangerous. For if any of them approoued the deſigne, their preparation might beget ſuſpition: if not, then the feares of diſcouery would extinguiſh the enterprize, no man daring to proceed further therein. Spaine was held the fitteſt to ſecond their attempts, but he was too ſlow in his preparations, and France too neere; and too dangerous to be dealt with; and how Holland ſtood affected to England, they all very well knew. But in the midſt of theſe turmoiles and mynings vnder ground, the Parliament was againe adiourned till the fift of October enſuing. Vpon which Proclamation they brake off both diſcourſe and work, till the Feaſt of Saint Maries Purification. At which time they laid in powder and other prouiſions, and then began againe to worke, hauing taken into their company Chriſtopher Wright and Robert Winter, both of them ſworne, and receiuing the Sacrament for ſecreſie. The wall (which was very hard, & nine foot thicke) with great labour they wrought halfe thorow; Fawkes being their Centinell to giue warning when any came neere, that the noyſe in digging might not be heard.

The Parliament againe prorogued.

Robert Winter, Chriſtopher Wright taken into conſort. The worke againe begun.

(50) The labourers thus working into the wall, were ſuddenly ſurprized with a great feare, and caſting from them their digging Tooles, tooke to their weapons, hauing ſufficient of ſhot and powder in the houſe, being fully reſolued, rather to dye in the place, then to yeeld or be taken. The cauſe of their feare, was a noyſe a noyſe they heard in a roome vnder the Parliament Houſe, vnder which they meant to haue myned, directly vnder the Chaire of Eſtate. But all now at a ſtand, and their countenance caſt each vpon other, as doubtfull what would bee the iſſue of this their enterprize: Fawkes ſcowted forth to deſcry (if he could) what was done abroad, and finding all ſafe and free from ſuſpect, returned, and told them, the noyſe was onely a remoouall of coales there now vpon ſale, and that the Cellar was to be let which would bee more commodious to their purpoſe, and would alſo ſpare the labour in the Myne. Whereupon Thomas Percy, vnder pretence for ſtowage of his Winter prouiſion of Wood and Coales, went and hired the Cellar, which done, a new conference was had.

(51) Wherein Catesby found the weight of the whole too heauy for himſelfe alone to ſupport; for beſides the maintenance of ſo many perſons, and the ſeuerall houſes for ſeuerall vſes, hired and paid for by him, the Gunpowder and other prouiſions would riſe to a very great ſumme, and indeed too much for one mans purſe. Therfore he deſired that himſelfe, Percy, & ſome one more might call in ſuch others as they thought fit to helpe to maintaine the charge, alleaging that they knew men of worth & wealth, that would willingly aſſiſt, but were not willing their names ſhould be knowne to the reſt. This his requeſt they approued as neceſſary, and withall ſurceaſing further to digge in the Vault, knowing the Cellar would bee of better vſe for their deſignes, they remooued twenty Barrels of Gunpowder into that roome, which they couered with a thouſand of Billets, and fiue hundred of Faggots, ſo that now the lodging roomes were cleered of all ſuſpicious prouiſions, and freely might be entred without danger of deſcry.

(52) But the Parliament being againe prorogued vntill the fifth of Nouember following, theſe fore-ſaid vnderminers of our State and happineſſe, thought fit they ſhould againe (for a while) diſperſe themſelues (matters being already in ſo good forwardneſſe) and that Guy Fawkes ſhould goe ouer to acquaint Sir William Stanley, and Maſter Hugh Owen with theſe their proceedings, yet ſo, as the oath of ſecreſie ſhould be taken of them. For their policy was to haue Sir William Stanleys preſence ſo ſoone as the diſmall blow ſhould be giuen, to be a Leader to their intended ſtratagems, whereof (as they thought) they ſhould haue great need, and that Owen ſhould remaine where he was, to hold correſpondency with forraine Princes, to allay (aſmuch as he might) the odiouſneſſe of the fact, or to impute the Treaſon to the Puritanes diſcontents.

(53) Fawkes comming into Flanders, found Owen, vnto whom, after the oath, hee declared the Plot, which hee very well approoued. But Sir William Stanley (at that time in Spaine) Owen ſaid, would be hardly drawne into the buſineſſe, for that hee had ſuits in the Engliſh Court himſelfe, yet hee promiſed to forward him in all that he could, and to ſend him into England with the firſt, when their proiect had taken effect. Whereupon Fawkes, to auoid further ſuſpicion, kept ſtill in Flanders vntill the beginning of September, and then returning, receiued the keyes of the Cellar, and laid in more Powder, Billets and Fagots; which done, hee retired into the Countrey and there kept till the end of October.

(54) In the meane-while Catesby and Percy meeting at the Bath, it was there concluded, becauſe their number were but few, that Catesby himſelfe ſhould haue power to call in whom he would, to ayde their deſigne: by which authority hee tooke in Sir Euerard Digby of Rutlandſhire Knight, and Francis Treſham of Northamptonſhire Eſquier, both of them of ſufficient eſtate and wealth, had they not abuſed both to their owne deſtruction: for Sir Euerard offered fifteene hundred pounds to forward the action, and Treſham two thouſand. But Percy diſdaining that any ſhould out-run him in euill, promiſed foure thouſand pounds out of the Earle of Northumberlands rents, and ten horſes of ſpeed to ſtead them when the blow was paſt. Againſt which time, to prouide munition, Catesby likewiſe tooke in Ambroſe Rookewood and Iohn Grant, two Recuſant Gentlemen, and vndoubtedly others were written in the ſame Roll, had theſe two grand Electors beene apprehended aliue, whoſe owne tongues only could vnfold their Catalogues Record.

(55) The buſineſſe thus forwarded by their Complices abroad, their Inmates did not neglect the ſupplies at home. For Percy, Winter, and Fawkes had ſtored the Cellar with thirty ſixe Barrels of Gunpowder, and vpon them beſtowed (in ſtead of ſhot) Barres of Iron, Logges of Timber, massie Stones, Iron Crowes, Picke-axes, and all their working tooles, and (to couer all) great store of Billets and Fagots, so that nothing was wanting, but all in a readinesse, attending that great and terrible day. Neither were the Iesuiticall Priests slacke on their parts, who vsually concluded their Masses and oblatory Sacrifices, with their prayers for the good successe of their expected hopes, as by these verses, made and vsed by Garnet is to be seene.

Gentem auferte perfidam credentium de finibus,
Vt Christo laudes debitas persoluamus alacriter.

And others thus, Prosper (Lord) their paines that labor in thy cause day and night, let Heresie vanish away like smoake, let their memory perish with a cracke, like the ruine and fall of a broken house: Allusions doubtlesse to the labours in the Vault, the mounting smoake of Powder, and the fall of the Parliament House, which if it had happened, they might haue said to haue beene Prophetically fore-told by their high Priests for that yeere.

(56) But the Lord, that neuer slipt the deliuerance of his Elect, kept this his Israel as the Apple of his owne eye, and this pit digged for the destruction of others, they fell into themselues: so that wee may well say, If the Lord had not been on our sides when men rose vp against vs, they had swallowed vs vp quicke, when their wrath was kindled against vs; but praised be the Lord which hath not giuen vs a prey vnto their teeth: our soule is escaped euen as a Bird out of the snare of the Fowler, the snare is broken, and we are deliuered. For this Cockatrice egge hatched by themselues, prooued a Serpent onely to themselues, and themselues (by Gods hand) made the only Instruments to breake the shell of their owne Treason.

Psal. 124.

(57) For vpon Thursday in the euening, ten daies before the intended Parliament, a Letter directed to the Lord Monteagle, was deliuered by an vnknowne person vnto his foot-man in the street, with a straight charge giuen, to giue it into his Lords own hand, which accordingly he did. The Letter was without date and subscription, and somewhat vnlegible, so as the Nobleman called for one of his seruants to assist him therin, the strange contents whereof much perplexed the true construction, as whether writ by some Pasquill to scarre him from attendance, or as matter of consequence from aduice of some friend. Howsoeuer, though it were Supper time, and the night as darke as the purport of the Letter; yet to discharge his loyall duty, he forth-with repayred to the Kings Palace at White-Hall, where he imparted the Letter to the Earle of Salisbury, Principall Secretary, and they both presently acquainted the Lord Chamberlaine therwith, who deemed the matter not a little to concerne himselfe, the charge of his Office being to ouer-see all places whither his Maiesty was to repaire; these two Councellors shewed the same Letter to the Earles of Worcester and Northampton, who together concluded (how slight soeuer the contents seemed to appeare, as proceeding from some surmises of an idle and light braine) to acquaint the King himselfe with the same, which accordingly was done, and was as followeth:

The Letter sent to the Lord Monteagle.

My Lord, out of the loue I beare to some of your friends, I haue a care of your preseruation. Therfore I would aduise you, as you tender your life, to deuise some excuse to shift off your attendance at this Parliament. For God and man haue concurred to punish the wickednesse of this time. And thinke not slightly of this aduertisement, but retire your selfe into your Countrey, where you may expect the euent in safety. For though there be no appearance of any stirre, yet I say, they shall receiue a terrible blow this Parliament, and yet they shall not see who hurts them. This counsell is not to be contemned, because it may doe you good, and can doe you no harme; for the danger is past, so soone as you haue burnt the Letter. And I hope God will giue you the grace to make good vse of it: to whose holy protection I commend you.

(58) His Maiesty a while pausing, and then re-reading the Letter, deliuered his iudgement, that the stile thereof was too quicke and pithy to be a libel bred from the superfluities of an idle braine, and on the instant did apprehend by these words; That they should receiue a terrible blow at this Parliament, and yet should not see who hurt them; that a sudden danger by blast of Gunpowder should bee intended by some base villaine in a corner, no insurrection, rebellion, or desperate attempt appearing. And therefore wished that the vnder-roomes of the Parliament House might bee throughly searched, before himselfe, or Peeres should sit therein. To which purpose it was then concluded, that the Lord Chamberlaine should (according to his Office and place) view all the roomes aboue and below: but as well to stay ſtay idle rumors, as to let things ripen to reueale their owne myſteries, this his ſearch ſhould be deferred vntill Munday, the day immediately before the Parliament, and then to be with a ſeeming-ſlight eye, to auoid ſuſpect.

Nou. 4. (59) The Earle of Suffolke, Lord Chamberlaine, according to the concluſion, vpon Munday in the afternoone (being accompanied with the Lord Monteagle, who ſtill thirſted to ſee the iſſue) repaired vnto thoſe vnder-roomes, and finding the Cellar ſo ſufficiently ſtored with Wood and Coales, demanded of Fawkes (the counterfeit Iohnſon, who ſtood there attending as a ſeruant of ſmal repute) who owed the place? his anſwer was, that the lodgings belonged to Maſter Thomas Percy, and the Cellar likewiſe, to lay in his Winter prouiſion, himſelfe being the Keeper and Maſter Percies ſeruant. Whereunto the Earle as voide of any other ſuſpicion, preſently replyed, that his Maſter was well prouided againſt Winters blaſts: but being come forth, the Lord Monteagle told him, that he did much ſuſpect Percy to be the inditer of the Letter, knowing his affection in religion, and the friendſhip betwixt them profeſſed, ſo as his heart gaue him (he ſaid) when hee heard Percy named, that his hand was in the act.

(60) The Lord Chamberlaine returning, related to the King in preſence of ſome Councellors, what he had ſeene: and the ſuſpicion that the Lord Monteagle had of Percy, and himſelfe of Iohnſon his man; which preſently increaſed his Maieſties apprehenſion and iealouſie: whereupon hee inſiſted, that a narrow ſearch ſhould be made, and thoſe Billets and Coales ſhould be turned to the bottome, which as he confidently ſuppoſed, was the couering of ſome notable intended Treaſon. But ſome mooued the doubt how this ſearch ſhould be made: for albeit no caution could be too much in ſo great a danger, yet the inducement thereunto, being no more then a nameleſſe Inſcript ſhuffled, no man knew whence, and might well be the euaporation of an idle braine, would ſeeme (if nothing were found) ſome ſcandall vnto the State, to be ouer-ſuſpicious of ſo friuolous a toy, and withall might leaue ſome ſad imputation on a great Councellor of the Land. Notwithſtanding, his Maieſty ſtill perſiſting in his former opinion, willed that the ſearch ſhould bee thorowly made, and no poſſibility of danger left vnexamined, vnleſſe they meant to goe to the Parliament, and leaue the hazard to the euent, which hee thought they in conſcience were loth to doe. Whereupon it was concluded, that the ſearch ſhould bee made; but vnder colour of ſearching for certaine hangings belonging to the Houſe which were miſſing, and conuayed away.

(61) Sir Thomas Kneuet, (now Lord Kneuet, then a Gentleman of his Maieſties Priuy Chamber) was imployed herein, and about mid-night (before the very morning when the Parliament was to begin) went into the place with a ſmall but well-affected company. At the doore of entrance into the Cellar, finding one (which was Guy Fawkes) at ſo vnſeaſonable a time, cloaked and booted, hee thought fit to apprehend him, and entring the place, ouer-turned the Billets and Coales, when preſently hee found the Serpents neſt, ſtored with thirty ſixe Barrels (ſmall and great) of Gunpowder, then ſearching the Villaine that ſhould haue hatched theſe egges, found about him a darke Lanterne, three matches and other inſtruments for blowing vp the Powder: who no whit daunted, inſtantly confeſſed his guiltineſſe, and was ſo farre from contrition or repentance, as hee vowed, that had hee beene found within the houſe (as indeed he was then but immediately come forth from his worke) hee certainly would haue blowne vp the houſe with himſelfe, and them all: and was ſo obdurate in his Romiſh reſolution, that being brought before the Lords of the Councell, hee lamented nothing ſo much, as that the deed had not beene done, ſaying, That the Diuell and not God was the diſcouerer of the Plot.

(62) As deſperate were Catesby, Percy, and the reſt, who hauing notice that the Lord Monteagles Letter gaue ſome ouerture of ſuſpicion, yet would they ſtay to ſee the ſucceſſe, and forſooke not London, vntill the ſame day wherein the deed ſhould haue beene done: Catesby, Percy, Rookewood, both the Wrights, and Thomas Winter, poſted all into Warwickſhire, where Grant and his aſſociates had taken certaine great horſes out of a ſtable, to forward their hoped great day. Theſe meeting at Dunchurch, where Sir Euerard Digby had made a match for a ſet hunting, not with Hounds for the Hare (which was onely the colour) but with Nimrod for blood, and ſurprize of the moſt vertuous young Princeſſe Lady Elizabeth, were told (by the eſcaped) of their certaine diſcouery, and preſent purſuit; when ſtrucke with terrour, not knowing where to make ſtay, or whither to ſtirre, they deſperately began an open rebellion, pretending the cauſe was Religion, and affirming for truth, that all the Catholikes throates were appointed to bee cut. And ſo trouping together, wandred thorow Warwickſhire, the edges of Worceſter, and borders of Staffordſhire, their ſeruants and ayders being about foureſcore men, and thoſe euer ready to ſteale away from them; more care was in keeping, then truſt repoſed either in their faith or defence. Yet thus ranging, and finding no reſiſtance, they rifled the Lord Windſors houſe of all the Armour, ſhot, powder, & other warlike prouiſions, but the weather rainy, and the waters ſomewhat high, the powder in carriage tooke wet, and thereby became vnſeruiceable; God in his Iuſtice ſo ordering the ſucceſſes, that the element of water, and accident of fire, fought againſt them, as the Stars in their courſes did againſt Siſera.

Iudges 5.20.

(63) For their laſt fort of refuge; being Holbach in Staffordſhire (the houſe of Stephen Littleton,) whither Sir Richard Walſh (high Sheriffe of Worceſterſhire) purſued them, who thinking the ſtirre no greater (though ſo, great enough) then ſome fray or ryot, ſent his Trumpet vnto them, commanding to render themſelues vnto him his Maieſties Miniſter, with promiſe of his beſt meanes (if they ſo did) to allay the offence. But their owne conſciences witneſſing what the Sheriffe knew not, told them, the fault was too waighty to leaue them any hope of fauour: and thereupon returned anſwer, that He had neede of greater aſsiſtance then of thoſe few numbers that were with him: before he could be able to command or controll them. So preparing for reſiſtance, they made ready their weapons, and hauing laid two pound of the ſaid powder in a platter to dry in the chimney, one (a Miller) comming to amend the fire, threw in a billet, wherewith a ſparke flying out, chanced to fall on the powder, whoſe ſudden blaſt was ſo violent, that (though being of ſo ſmall a quantity) it blew vp the roofe of the houſe, and ſcorched the bodies and faces of Catesby, Rookewood and Grant, with ſome others, whoſe conſciences then ſtrucken with the guilt of their ſinne, made them ſee Gods ſearching Iuſtice in puniſhing like with like. Thus being deiected with the accident, and now knowing that all was loſt, like deſperate men, they there reſolued to dye together, ſet open the gate, ſuffered the Sheriffes followers to ruſh in among them, and by valour (as they tearmed it) fought for their owne deſtruction; for both the Wrights were therein ſhot downe dead, Ambroſe Rookewood, and Thomas Winter were very ſore wounded; and laſtly, Catesby and Percy reſolutely fighting, backe to backe, were both of them ſlaine with one Bullet of Musket-ſhot.

Fire-working Traitors puniſhed by fire.

(64) Thus theſe high-aſpiring ſpirits, deceiued with the ſpirit of illuſion, vnder opinion of religion, and dreaming of no leſſe then deſtruction of King, Princes & People, with alterations of Kingdome, Church and State, were miſerably defeated, not by humane prouidence, but diuine mercy. Some preſently ſlaine in heate of Rebellion, others deadly wounded, were taken aliue, the reſt either whole or but lightly hurt, were led priſoners to London, and to other places, all the way gazed at, reuiled and deteſted by the common people, as ſome ſtrange Monſters of the world, for this their helliſh and horrible Treaſon; and laſtly, condemned and executed as they moſt worthily deſerued; whoſe inditements, arraignments and confeſſions, I referre to bee read in the true Relations already printed thereof, with ſundry other weighty matters thereto incident, in that learned diſcourſe, written by the moſt honourable Lord Henry Howard, Earle of Northampton, Lord Priuy Seale.

An. Dom. 1605.

(65) In memory of which great deliuerance, the fifth of Nouember (the day appointed for mercileſſe deſtruction) was by authority of the ſame Parliament enacted to bee for euer celebrated with thanksgiuing, praiſe and prayers vnto our heauenly Preſeruer, and to be kept holy vnto the Lord through our generations, which we wiſh may bee obſerued, with no leſſe acknowledgement of Gods infinite mercies to vs-ward, then was among the Iewes, the inſtitution of their Purim, for their deliuerance from the practice of wicked Haman, that ſo our Temples being thus freed from their prophane Idolatry, we may euer make this day as the feaſt of our dedication, like to the Maccabees, who in the ſame moneth did inſtitute theirs, by cleanſing Gods Temple of heatheniſh pollutions. So ſhall Chriſt with his ſpirituall approch, beautifie this Church of ours, as with his humane preſence

For my part, I haue here only pointed at His Maiesties first entrance and acts, rather to shew a liberty of writing the Kingdomes affaires, which neuer is permitted, sauing vnder good Princes, then by my vnable performance to enter into that which requires the pen of some iudicious Tacitus, or eloquent Zenophon, and conclude with the aduice of Amianus Marcellinus, the famous Historian: Let other men for experience more sufficient, and for learning better knowne, write the rest, whom, if it shall please them to enter thereupon, I aduise, to frame their pens vnto an higher Style.

A SVMMARY CONCLVSION OF THE VVHOLE.

BY the aſſiſtance of the All-Sufficient (the only Defence & Preſeruer of man) my inſufficient abilities haue attained the end of this worke, and my weake vnable Perſon brought to a Period this large Edifice of GREAT BRITAINS THEATRE. How acceptable to others, I know not; but with what paines and trauell to my ſelfe, my decayed ſtrength too manifeſtly hath felt, and with what care of truth, the Authorities alleaged thorow the whole Proceſſe, are my witneſſes; whoſe lines haue beene the meaſures, and Antiquities the matter, that hath raiſed the Fabrick vnto this height. The attempt was great, and farre vnfit (I muſt confeſſe) for me to vndergoe; which, euen at the firſt entrance was ſo cenſured by the Iudicious, and in the continuance hath ſo prooued: that now it being finiſhed, as the Silk-worme endeth her life in her long-wrought clew, ſo I in this Theatre haue built my owne Graue; whoſe Architecture howſoeuer defectiue it may be ſaid to be, yet the proiect is good, and the coſt great, though my ſelfe haue freely beſtowed this paines to the Preſſe, without preſſing a penny from any mans purſe. For me to ſhew the vtility of Hiſtory, were to light a dimme candle before the bright

The firſt Inhabitants.

(2) Our Land, peopled from Iapheth the firſt ſon of Noah, fell vnto thoſe ſonnes of Gomer and Iauan (the firſt and fourth ſons of Iaphet) which inhabited theſe parts of Europe, whoſe Iſſue were moſt famouſly known by the name of Britaines. At firſt, naked, rude, & ignorant of the true God; yet no ſooner were frequented with the ciuill Romans, but that they couered their Cut-painted bodies with Garments, and ſhortly imitated them euen in their moſt ciuilized actions; yea, ſcarcely was Chriſt taken downe from his Croße, but they became Chriſtians, (the greateſt glory of any Nation) and among them the Goſpell had her firſt progreſſe by eſtabliſhed authority. Their Gouernment was vnder Kings, and thoſe of as honorable a reſpect, as were any other in theſe Weſt-parts of the world, both in training their Subiects vnto due obedience, and miniſtring of Lawes for the maintenance of eſtate. Their warres domeſticke and forraine, were ſo managed with Policy and valour, as in the one they valiantly defended themſelues againſt their aſſaults, and in the other ſteaded the Romanes in moſt of their Conqueſts: which coſt them laſtly their owne ſubuerſions, when their Warriers and Virgins were conſumed and tranſported into other parts, whilſt their natiue Land lay expoſed to the will of Inuaders.

(3) The glory-thirſting Romanes (from a crue of lawleſſe Shepheards, now lately become Lords of the World (were the firſt that ſet foot, with diſplaied Enſigne, for the Conqueſt of Britain, and the ſame firſt aſſaied by Iulius Cæſar from the Coaſts of Gallia. Which his attempt was ſo honourable in eſteeme of their Emperors, that Claud. (the 5. in ſucceſſiõ) holding the Triumph but baſe, that attends vpon authority without action of Price, made choiſe of Britaine to adorne his triumphãt Chariot, that this Iland (ſited, as was thought, in another World, and but part thereof ſhewed by Cæſar to the Romans) might adde remembrance of name to his forgetfull Perſon: and to that end hauing made hither himſelfe, ſtamped his Conqueſt vpõ his Coines thus, DE BRITANN: and vpon his aged knees crept vp the ſteps of the Capitoll, to giue thanks of victory vnto his gods on the day of his Triumph; which, though for a ſmall part of this Ilands ſubiection, was yet accompliſhed with more then ordinary magnificence, and the ſhewes greater then vſually had been ſeene, for the Conqueſts of farre larger & better known Kingdoms. And with as great a care was it kept, whilſt the Romans kept their owne greatnes. But when their high-mounted Pillar ouer-ſwayed her owne Baſe, and the farſpred boughs were growne too weighty for the ſtemme, many hands at once graſped at the Emperiall Crowne, and all of them together tare the Branches from the Body of that faire Tree. By whom alſo the faire & flouriſhing Cedars of Britaine were ſhaken, and left naked both of fruit, and leafe. So that now the glory of the one declined, and the beauty of the other vtterly defaced, & neither of them able any longer to ſupport their owne ſtandings, gaue place vnto deſtiny that would now haue both downe; whereby the Iewell ſo much deſired, & which had been kept with ſuch care, was now laid at ſtake to them that could win it, and Britaine abandoned by the Romanes, without further claime, after they had been Lords thereof the ſpace of fiue hundred yeeres.

(4) The next Actors vpon Britaines faire Stage, were the Saxons, a people of Germany, fierce, bold, and irreligious, as, for the moſt part, the reſt of Nations in thoſe daies were. Theſe infeſting with Piracies the Coaſts of Britaine & Gallia, grew both fearefull and famous in profeſſiõ of military ſeruices. In France they ſeized vpon the Country of * Baiocaſſes; in Germany by intruſiõ they vnſeated the Sueuians; in Holland and Freezeland, they incroached vpon the Batauians, and Cimbrica Cherſoneſſus (now a continent of Denmarke) they made the place of their aboad. From whence they often aſſailed the Coaſts of this Iland, euen whilſt the Romans held it for theirs, and were often put backe by Stilicho and others, whoſe praiſes the Poet Claudian chaunted aloud. But the Romanes departed, & Britaine left bare of men, their land waſted by famine, tumultuous vprores, and by bandings of Great-ones who ſhould be greateſt; the Scots and Picts (ancient Enemies to their Peace) tooke the aduantage, and continually made bloody incurſions into their Land.

Land. And albeit a ſtone-wall was raiſed athwart the whole Continent, to impeach their inroades, yet that auailed little, their aſſaults were ſo great. Whereupon the Saxons were ſent for; and in their firſt ſeruice freed the Britaines from thoſe raging Picts; The Lands defence they then vndertooke, and the Inhabitants conſented to maintaine the charge; which whilſt it was in giuing, was thankfully receiued, but once receiued, was vngratefully forgot. And they (like the Rauens of Arabia, who ſo long as they are full, yeeld a pleaſant noiſe, but being empty make a horrible cry) emptied faſter then the Britaines could fill, and euer complained they had not enough, till laſtly by ſurprize they got all into their owne clawes. Then diuided they among themſelues the beſt of the Land, and droue their receiuers into the worſt and waſte mountaines of Wales, euery of their Captaines ſharing a part to himſelfe, and of one Imperiall Crowne made ſeuen Diademes to adorne their owne heads; which long were not worne, without inteſtine warres, each of them ſtriuing to inlarge his owne, vpon his next, till God and deſtiny againe brought all vnto One, euen to great Egbert, who forbade the Ilands old Name, and commanded theſe now vnited Prouinces to bee called Anglia. Yet no ſooner was this accompliſhed, with aſſured hopes conceiued, that the Saxons glory ſhould thenceforward aſcend and ſpread forth with peace, but that a Sauage nation, fierce as the Scythians, caſt their eyes of deſire vpon that Beautifull Crown, and preſently attempted, but neuer intermitted any bloody cruelties that could forward the ſame, till they had ſet it on their own Helmets; and theſe Saxons worne out with reſiſtance, gaue place to the Danes, when time had worne out fiue hundred ſixty three yeeres of their Gouernment.

The Heptarchy again reuolued to a Monarchie

Britaine firſt named England.

The Saxons confuſion.

The Danes intruſion.

(5) Theſe Danes thus ſucceeding (though with no better right to enioy) were a ſtout ſturdy Nation, whoſe many Piracies both France and Bretaigne had many times felt, before they attained the end of this their Goale. For theſe, multiplying like Bees in the Hiue, the land of their own natiuity was too little for each to haue a part: vpon which occaſion a cuſtome was practiſed to baniſh ſome, that the reſt might haue roome. Theſe Exiles therefore (chiefely conſiſting of their youth) fell vpon other Lands with no leſſe danger, then the falling of a ſword out of the ſheath, and grieuouſly wounded whereſoeuer they fell; but no where more deadly then in England. Which for two hundred and eighteene yeeres continuance, they vnceſſantly aſſaulted; ſometimes harrowing the Countrey before them, and carrying away great Booties to their Ships: ſometimes impoueriſhing the People, by exacting great ſums of money for compoſition of Peace: ſometimes expelling the inhabitants, and ſeating themſelues in their places: and ſometimes ſharing the Countrey with their Kings, and taking vnto themſelues none of the worſt, but not as other Conquerors, to build, ſow, and plant, but to lay waſte, caſt downe, and deſtroy, ſparing neither Erections for ciuill vſe, nor places of Oratory dedicated to diuine. Yet the Garland once gotten by their King Canute, was worn with great glory, and by three of thoſe Daniſh Kings, Englands Crowne was enioyed. The firſt of them Potent, religious, wiſe and iuſt. The ſecond, illegitimate, an vſurper, very agill, but idle: And the third a Tyrant, a Taxe-raiſer, laſciuious, and a glutton, in which exceſſe at Lambeth hee ſuddenly ended his life, when the Land became cleared of the Danes ſore oppreſſions, after they had a long time attempted, and their Kings for fiue and twenty yeeres ſpace worne the royal Diademe of this Realm.

Their end.

The Normans.

(6) Theſe foure Nations fulfilling their times by Heauens aſſignement, in gaining, keeping, and againe loſing the rich Garland of GREAT BRITAINS gouernment: a fift, inferiour to none, made thereunto a double claime, and by a third (more ſure then both) which was, their conquering ſword, got it. Theſe laſt (which I pray may be laſt) were the Normans, a people fierce and valorous, whoſe many Sea-aduentures were ſo great, in the dayes of Charles the Great, as that he wept to fore-ſee the harmes they would doe to his in France, which proued ſo many, that Charles the Bald (his Grand-Child) was forced to part with the Earledome of Charters vnto Haſting a Normã; Charles the Groſſe with the County Newſtria, vnto Godfrey their Chieftaine: and Charles the Simple, with all the Countries which lay betwixt the Riuer Seine and Loyre, vnto Rollo their Leader, whereof he became Duke, and that Dutchie from him, named Normandy. Whence William the Baſtard, the ſeuenth in diſcent, in a bloody field at Battell in Suſſex, wan the Engliſh Crowne from King Harold that held held it; when, by changing of Lawes, diſheriting of Nobles, and beſtowing the Lands Reuenewes vpon his, he laid the foundation of a glorious Monarchy. At firſt, ſomewhat bloody, (as Conqueſts commonly proue) and the Crowne banded for, among brethren and kindred (as what will not the deſire of a Diademe do?) the two yonger brethren ſucceſſiuely wearing it, to the preiudice of their * Elder, and Stephen hauing no right, but ſuch as Intruders pretend. But Henry Plantagenet placed on the Throne, and three hundred thirty one yeers taken vp in the Raignes of fourteene Kings of his line, their Acts affoord matter of more Princely conſequence, their Dominions ſpread wider, themſelues being the lawful Inheritors to the third part of France, and to the Whole by the Title of their 3. Edward, and by the Conqueſt of their fifth Henry. And ſurely had not the ciuill diſſentions of Lancaſter & Yorke ſpent their weapons in the wounds of themſelues, thoſe Kings and their Succeſſours vndoubtedly had beene double crowned euen to this day. But theſe Roſes pluckt off by diſſentions hands, and their branches torne down in home-bred broyles, their Royall roots lay as it were dead in the Earth, till Teuder of Lancaſter with Plantagenet of Yorke, gaue them vigor and ſappe; by binding both together in wedlockes golden band. Whereby alſo the long dead ſtemme of the ancient Britiſh Kings began againe to bud forth, and fiue renowned Princes of that Sirname ſucceeded in Englands Throne. * The firſt of them, the richeſt, and wiſeſt King of this Weſtern-world: * The Second, the foreſt wonder of the Papall authority; * The third, the forwardeſt in all pious actions. * The fourth, the feruenteſt for the Religion of Rome; * And the fifth a Mayden-Queene, the moſt famouſly renowned among the worlds Monarks, vnder whoſe raignes one hundred and ſixteene yeeres were fully complete & run. And were it not that the Engliſh are taxed to be ouermuch addicted vnto vain Propheſies, and that Merlins was prohibited by decree of Councell, I might alledge his, and that of Aquila at Shaftesbury, both of them foreſhewing that the Britiſh Empire, after the Saxons and Normans, ſhould returne again to her ancient Stocke and Name. Notwithſtanding, Truth bids vs acknowledge, how farre God hath accompliſhed both theſe in the royall Perſon of our now Soueraigne, the one by his diſcent from the loines of that royall Tuder King Henry the ſeuenth; and the other, by his Edict, in reſtoring to the Iland her ancient Name, Brittania: himſelfe being the firſt Monarch of the two Kingdomes Vnion, and the greateſt of Command, ſince Canutus the Dane. The Cords of whoſe Royall Tents, we pray, may be further extended, that thoſe naked Virginians may be couered vnder the Curtaines of his moſt Chriſtian Gouernment; and that the Scepter of his Peace may bud, as Aarons Rod in his hand, and in the hand of his Son, and Sons Sons, ſo long as the Sun and Moone endureth.

(7) Theſe then (worthy Reader) are the Heads, whence haue iſſued ſuch plentifull Springs, that now met together in one Body, the Streame is growne very bigge, which thing I euer feared, but could neuer preuent; offending rather with the Niggard, who thinketh euery mite too-much, then ſinning with the Prodigall in ſuperfluous exceſſe; ſo plenteous is our Story, & ſo largely requires it to be writ. Thorow all wch, my weake body with many yeers labour hath alone trauelled, aſwell in the reuiewing of the Geographical parts of the Land, as in the compiling of the ſucceeding Hiſtory, though farre vnable to perfect either according to their own worths. But leſt the waight of the whole ſhould reſt vpon ſo ſlender a proppe as my ſelfe: I haue laid my buildings vpon farre ſtronger arches, as by the many alleaged authorities may appeare. For firſt, the Chards for the moſt part traced by others, and moſt of them diuulged vnto view, were the foundations of my begun pains; in ſupplying their wants with my many additions, and dimenſions of the Shire-townes and Cities true platformes. The further deſcriptions of ſundry Prouinces, I haue gleaned from the famous workes of the moſt worthy and learned Cambden; whoſe often ſowed ſeeds in that Soile, haue laſtly brought forth a moſt plenteous harueſt. For the body of the Hiſtory, many were the manuſcripts, notes, and Records, wherewith my honoured and learned friends ſupplyed me; but none more (or ſo many) as did the worthy repairer of eating times ruines, the learned Sir Robert Cotte Knight Bãnoret, another Philadelphus in preſeruing old Monuments and ancient Records: whoſe Cabinets were vnlocked, & Library cõtinually ſet open to my free acceſſe; and from whence the chiefeſt garniſhments of this worke haue beene beene enlarged and brought: ſuch as are the antique altars, & Trophies in Stone, by him preſerued from periſhing obliuion; the Coines of gold, ſiluer, alcumy, and copper, of the Britaines, Romanes, Saxons, Danes, and Engliſh, with the Broad Seales of thoſe Kings ſince the ſame were in vſe: all of them ſo followed from the originall models, and moneyes, by the moſt exquiſit and curious hand of our age, as any eye may witneſſe they are the true prints from thoſe ſtamps. The like moſt acceptable helpes, both of Bookes and Collections, (eſpecially in matters remoter from our times) I continually receiued from that worthy Diuine, Maſter Iohn Barkham, a Gentleman compoſed of Learning, Vertue and Courteſie, asbeing no leſſe ingeniouſly willing, then learnedly able to aduance and forward all vertuous endeauours. Laſtly, for the matters of Heraldry, the willing and ready paines of Maſter William Smith, Rough Dragon, (an Officer at Armes) was euer at hand: and by theſe hands this building is mounted to ſuch an height as thou ſeeſt; which thus now finiſhed, this ſcanted Epitome may well ſerue thy foot-ſteps, as ſtaires to aſcend theſe fiue nationall Stories already finiſhed, and lead thee into the ſixth now moſt happily begun. Where from thoſe mounted heights, thou mayeſt behold, how Time hath ſquared the Stones of theſe buildings: how Fortune hath varied in contriuing the Worke: and how the Fates haue erected, poliſhed, and puld downe the ſupporting Pillars of GREAT BRITAINES THEATRE.
